CONGRESSIONAL RECORD AND APPENDIX.

FORTY-THIRD CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION.

PART II.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

[From January 29, 1874, to March 5, 1874.]

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. If the House should refuse to recommit would it not then be in order to send it to the Committee of the Whole and make it a special order for a particular day?

The SPEAKER. It would necessarily go to the Committee of the Whole on the point of order already raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] but it would not be within the competency of a majority of the House to make it a special order. It would simply take its place on the Calendar in Committee of the Whole, and then it could be reached by a majority of the committee laying aside the intervening orders.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Then as soon as we go into Committee of the Whole a majority of the committee can take it up if they see fit?

The SPEAKER. Except—as the Chair has already stated, although he believes the gentleman from Indiana was not in his seat at the time—except in the case of bills which have been made a special order by the House; and then the House itself, while the motion to go into Committee of the Whole is pending, can lay aside those bills, so that it is in the power of the House absolutely to get at any bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to add my testimony to what several have said in favor of having such discussion of this bill as can be had in Committee of the Whole. That is really the best place, it seems to me, for a full and free discussion. I do not care what preliminary motion the gentleman may make, if it results in putting the bill in Committee of the Whole, where we can have such debate upon it as it deserves. I am very sure that few subjects can possibly be brought to the attention of the House as important to the interests of the country as this bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that I had suggested that I desired to have this bill placed so that it shall be a special order in Committee of the Whole two weeks from to-day, excepting, of course, appropriation bills and the bills reported from the Committee on Ways and Means the other day. That is my wish, and that is what I have been trying to accomplish, if the House concurs with me. If it does not, of course I must accept their action.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Does any one object to that arrangement?

Mr. RANDALL. I do.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him why he puts it off for two weeks?

Mr. MAYNARD. I stated the reason that operated upon the committee, and I am acting under their instructions. They thought that within that time the bill could by printed and sent out to the country, so that we might get the benefit of such criticism as intelligent men would desire to make.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to say that I dissent from the idea that the first business for us to do is to make appropriations. Everybody knows that no appropriations we make at this session of Congress can take effect until the 1st day of next July, except in deficiency bills. All the regular appropriations take effect then. There is no more important question than this, and we should take it up and settle, so far as the House is concerned, the question of currency and taxation. I think they should be settled together. I should therefore desire, for one, that the bill be committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and then, as the Speaker has informed us, it will be within the power of the House to bring it up at any time, and we may discuss the proposition of the Committee on Ways and Means as to taxation and the proposition of currency involved in this bill together.

Now, if the gentleman will let the bill go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union it will be printed at once, and we shall hear from the country as soon as they choose to inform us. But, in the mean time, suppose we should consider it our duty to inform the country instead of the country informing us; suppose we consider it our duty to inform the country—we are sent here for that purpose—what is the intention of Congress, without the interference of men who always look at legislative measures as a means of interfering with the business of the country.

I think there is no more important subject to be discussed in the House, and I think that the question of time enters largely into the question of importance. It is a question that ought to be discussed at the earliest possible day. If the gentleman has been as fortunate as I have been, his table is piled up a foot high, and higher, with pamphlets, papers, and instructions; and if he has read them all I congratulate him. I am as ready as I ever shall be to go into this discussion, and I believe every other gentleman is ready to go into it as soon as we can reach it. I hope, therefore, the idea of my colleague [Mr. G. F. HOAR] will be adopted, and that the bill will be referred at once to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it will come up along with the question of taxation. It seems to be the universal opinion that the two ought to come up together. Let us not fix any day, but let us get the bills up as soon as we can.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move first that the bill be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. I suppose this subject is understood by the House, and in order to test the sense of the House I renew my motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency, giving notice that if that motion shall prevail I shall enter a motion to reconsider, and shall endeavor, if I can get the floor, to call up the motion two weeks hence.

The SPEAKER. The motion being privileged, the gentleman can of course get the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. I think a great deal of time will be saved by sending the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union at once, and I hope the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee will be voted down.

The question was taken on Mr. MAYNARD'S motion, and it was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] raises the point of order that this bill cannot now be considered in the House, but must first be considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the bill will go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MAYNARD. I give notice that if I can get the ear and the eye of the Chair, I will, two weeks from this day if not earlier, endeavor to get the House into Committee of the Whole and to reach this bill for discussion.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the gentleman that he put this bill with the others, and that they go along together.

Mr. MAYNARD. We can arrange that.

The SPEAKER. If gentlemen will send for the Calendar of the House, at any time they can see precisely what is to be done in order to get at any particular bill upon it.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I ask consent that this bill be printed in the RECORD

The SPEAKER. The bill has been read in full by the Clerk, and of course will go into the RECORD.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE CURRENCY, ETC.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to report back adversely House bill No. 41, for the improvement of the currency and the reduction of the interest on the funded debt of the United States, and to move that the same be laid on the table.

Mr. KELLEY. I move to amend the motion, so that the bill shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole in connection with the other bill; and upon that I call the previous question.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I raise the point of order that the bill must be first considered in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask that the bill may be read, so that it may go into the RECORD.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. It has already been printed, and is all over the House.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read the bill.

The first section provides that the amount of United States notes in circulation be limited, except as hereinafter provided, to $400,000,000; and that any holder of said notes presenting any sum not less than $50, or some multiple thereof, to the Treasury of the United States, or any of the assistant treasurers, shall receive in exchange therefor an equal amount of bonds of the United States, coupon or registered, as may by said holder be desired, bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, which the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to prepare and furnish for that purpose; and that when any person shall demand of the Treasurer of the United States, or any assistant treasurer, redemption of said bonds, it shall be the duty of said Treasurer or assistant treasurer to pay in United States notes the principal of said bond or bonds with accrued interest, and cancel and forward the bonds thus redeemed to the Treasurer of the United States forthwith, in such manner as the Secretary may prescribe. The second section provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be prepared United States notes of the several denominations now in use to the amount of $50,000,000, which shall be held as a reserve or redemption fund for the purpose of securing prompt payment of said bonds when demanded, and the United States notes so held in reserve shall be used only when needed for the payment of said bonds on their presentation, and shall be withdrawn and placed again in reserve out of any United States notes not otherwise appropriated received by the Treasury Department thereafter; and the whole amount of United States notes received by the Treasury Department in exchange for said bonds bearing 3.65 per cent. interest shall be appropriated and applied by the Secretary of the Treasury as rapidly as practicable to the purchase or redemption of any bonds of the United States outstanding at the passage of this act. The third section authorizes national banks to hold said bonds bearing 3.65 per cent. interest instead of the reserve of United States notes now required by law.

The bill was then referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

OCEAN NATIONAL BANK, NEW YORK.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to report back a resolution referred to that committee in relation to the Ocean National Bank, New York, and a substitute therefor.

The SPEAKER. The substitute alone will be read, and treated as an original resolution, unless objected to.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be, and are hereby, instructed and required to investigate the affairs of the Ocean National Bank, of New York City, and especially to inquire whether Theodore M. Davis, receiver therefor, and other officials, have been guilty of illegal or improper conduct in the management of its affairs, either in disposing of any portion of its securities at less than their par value and becoming personally interested in the purchase thereof, or in any other manner. That said committee have power to send for persons and papers, to appoint a sub-committee, with power to employ a clerk and stenographer, to take testimony in New York or elsewhere, and to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SPEER. I suggest that the word "and" should be changed to "or" between the words "illegal" and "improper," so that it will read "guilty of illegal or improper conduct."

Mr. MAYNARD. I accept the suggestion.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I would like to have the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. MAYNARD] explain to the House the reason why the House of Representatives of the United States should assume the functions of investigator over national banks, or the character of any of their officers who may be charged with embezzlement or other improper conduct. There is an officer upon whom that duty is imposed, and I suppose there is some reason why the House of Representatives is called upon to perform that duty.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask that the original resolution referred to the committee be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the Ocean National Bank, of the city of New York, failed December 12, 1871, having a capital of $1,000,000, and assets to the amount of $2,600,000, and owing debts to the amount of $1,400,000, and on that day one Theodore M. Davis, of the city of New York, was appointed receiver of said bank by the Comptroller of the Currency, Hulburd, and the said Davis, immediately after his said appointment, entered upon the duties of his office, taking possession of all the property and assets of said bank, amounting to $2,600,000, and has, since that time, had control of said bank, its assets and all its affairs; and whereas it appears by the report of said Davis, in the hands of the present Comptroller of the Currency, that up to July, 1873, a period of unvarying financial prosperity, that he has paid to the creditors only the sum of $886,660, and has remaining in his hands, of both good and doubtful assets, only $260,000, showing a loss under his administration of over $1,300,000, and that since the said Davis has entered upon the duties of his said office as receiver he has been guilty of illegal and improper conduct in his said office in reference to the assets of said bank and in managing its affairs; and whereas his illegal and improper conduct has for several months last past been brought to the attention of the Comptroller without redress or removal of said Davis from the office of receiver, so that the action of Congress seems to be the only remedy in the premises: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency proceed forthwith to investigate the affairs of said bank, and the conduct of said Davis and other officials connected with said bank, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I waive all objection to the resolution.

Mr. MAYNARD. The committee were satisfied that such a resolution as we now report ought to be adopted, though they were not willing to recommend the adoption of the preamble to the original resolution. The committee were unanimous in their decision.

The SPEAKER. The substitute, as reported, will be treated as an original resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POSTAL SAVINGS-BANKS.

Mr. MAYNARD. By the same committee, I am instructed to report back adversely, with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole, the bill (H. R. No. 797) to establish and maintain a national savings depository as a branch of the Post-Office Department.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MAYNARD. I give notice that I shall endeavor to have this bill taken up at as early a day as may be convenient after the middle of April.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call attention to the ground of his ruling on this point, which differs from the point raised upon the commitment of a bill. When a committee reports adversely a bill that should properly receive its first consideration in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the Chair, when the point is made, will, instead of having the bill laid on the table, send it to the Committee of the Whole, because the opponents of the bill ought not to be precluded from discussion by a motion which is not debatable. To send such a bill to the Committee of the Whole puts all sides on an equality.

Mr. RANDALL. Just here let me ask the Chair whether a committee has not the right to report a bill adversely and move that it lie on the table?

The SPEAKER. If the bill contains an appropriation of money, or is a tax bill, the Chair thinks not. The first discussion on such a measure should, in the opinion of the Chair, be had in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, because thus both sides are afforded an equal opportunity for debate. This ruling of the Chair is in the interest of free and wide discussion.

Mr. RANDALL. This ruling prevents the majority of a committee from acting unfairly toward a measure.

The SPEAKER. It prevents a majority of a committee or a majority of the House from deciding summarily questions embraced in a bill which are entitled to consideration in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the ruling of the Chair is right.

CITIZENS' NATIONAL BANK, HAGERSTOWN, MARYLAND.

Mr. PHELPS, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back, with an amendment in the form of a substitute, the bill (H. R. No. 839) authorizing the Citizens' National Bank of Hagerstown, Maryland, to change its location.

The SPEAKER. Unless there be objection, the substitute alone will be read, and will be treated as an original bill.

The bill (H. R. No. 1573) was read.

It authorizes the Citizens' National Bank of Hagerstown, Washington County, Maryland, to change its location to the city of Washington, District of Columbia, provided that the capital stock of the bank shall be increased to $200,000 before the bank shall begin business in Washington City; and the name of the bank is to be changed to the Citizens' National Bank of Washington City. Whenever the stockholders, representing two-thirds of the capital stock of the bank, at a meeting called for that purpose, shall execute a certificate under the corporate seal of the bank, certifying such determination, and shall cause the same to be recorded in the office of the Comptroller of the Currency, and shall publish notice of such contemplated change of location in two weekly papers in Hagerstown, Maryland, not less than four weeks, thereupon such change of location and name shall be effected; and the operations of discount and deposit by the bank shall be carried on in Washington City. But the acceptance of the act is to be made within six months after its passage; and all expenses incident to the proposed change, including engraving, shall be borne and paid by the bank. The second section provides that nothing in the act shall be construed as in any manner releasing the bank from any debt, demand, or liability whatever, nor affect any action or proceeding in law in which the bank may be a party interested. All the rights, privileges, and powers of the Citizens' National Bank of Hagerstown, Maryland, are to devolve upon the Citizens' National Bank of Washington City whenever such change is effected.

Mr. PHELPS. The committee have instructed me to report this bill, with the recommendation that the substitute be passed. The substitute has been prepared for simple reasons of form, the language and structure of the original bill being somewhat awkward and inapt. The substitute embraces but two alterations of any importance affecting the merits of the measure. One is a provision which we have inserted, that all expenses of this change of location shall be borne by the bank. The other is a provision that the capital of the bank shall be increased to $200,000; its present capital is but $50,000; and the increase is made necessary by that provision of the general banking law which requires that a bank established in a city having fifty thousand inhabitants or more shall have a capital of at least $200,000.

The bill authorizes this Citizens' Bank of Hagerstown to change its location to the city of Washington, and take the name of the Citizens' Bank of Washington. The change is in accordance with the precedents of the Department. Nine changes were made by the Forty-second Congress of the location and of the name of national banks; and this especial act has received the approbation of the Comptroller of the Currency, who states there is nothing in the policy of the Department that would make the change of location and of name impolitic or undesirable. I understand my colleague from New York [Mr. MERRIAM] wishes the floor for a minute or two, and I yield to him.

Mr. KELLEY. May I ask a question of the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. PHELPS. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. Does this increase the circulation the bank is to have?

Mr. PHELPS. No, sir.

Mr. MERRIAM. Mr. Speaker, I regret to antagonize any measure reported from the committee of which I am a member, but there are two important reasons why, in my judgment, this bill should not pass.

First. I do not think it wise for Congress to increase the banking facilities of large cities by taking them away from the interior of the country, where we all know there is a disproportionate amount of banking capital.

Secondly. A fact, which I presume will surprise many of the oldest members of this House, and which of itself is sufficient reason for not authorizing the removal of any bank to the District of Columbia—and that is, no tax other than national is imposed in this District upon banks except the trifling license tax of fifty cents on every thousand dollars of capital.

I will make no apology for stating, in this connection, a fact still more startling; and that is, while Congress is, by its annual appropriations, taxing our constituents millions of dollars for the improvements in this District, not one dollar of tax is levied upon the millions of dollars of personal property centralized here by reason of exemption from burdens imposed elsewhere upon like property. Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that this is not in harmony with the spirit of our institutions or with a proper regard to the rights of people elsewhere.

I stand, Mr. Speaker, in profound admiration of the patriotism and unselfishness of those men who administer the affairs of this District, and who annually press Congress for appropriations to adorn and beautify their native city—appropriations so large that I have felt constrained heretofore to cast my vote against them. It is true there are many good men and good citizens associated in the administration of the affairs of this District, but they should not forget that we owe a responsibility to our own constituents, whose money in part paves streets, levels hills, and fills valleys in the suburbs of the city, and from which expenditures real-estate speculators become rich.

I am aware that the citizens of this Republic take a just pride in the capital of the nation, and that they would be glad to see it become the finest city on the continent. All who have visited it the past year have admired the improvements consequent to a general upheaval of street, lane, and by-way. The change from chivalry to shovelry is already apparent and admirable. [Laughter.] But would it have intensified their admiration to have been told that their money was the master power, while the capital in the safes of the very wealthy bore no part? No, Mr. Speaker; the people are sensitive upon the subject of unequal taxation.

I had occasion, when investigating the facts as to taxation in this District, to inquire why the millions and millions of personal property owned by the wealthy of this District were exempt from taxation, and I was told by those most patriotic and interested fathers that it was to induce Congressmen to settle here after their labors were no longer appreciated by their constituents. [Laughter.] Generous hospitality, convincing argument, to those who see in their own valleys, and on their own hills, and in their own homes, beauties and advantages never known here! But, Mr. Speaker, I confess they cannot boast of homes where personal property is exempt from taxation.

From earliest childhood I have been taught that there were two things we could never escape from in this world—death and taxation. But it seems that the ingenious fathers of this District have removed one of the inevitables; and who can tell but that they have in contemplation the removal of the other? [Laughter.] Only in such accomplishment can they hope to people, in this generation, the speculative city lots made accessible by streets paved largely with the people's money, while the rich, the great, the happy of this District know no tax forever.

I make no apology, Mr. Speaker, for calling the attention of Congress to this monstrous injustice by the authorities of this District, who in their generosity to the rich have managed to override one of the demands of a free people—the equalization of taxation. I do it in the hope that Congress will vote no dollar more to improve this city until all property alike shares the burdens.

Why, Mr. Speaker, this is the very paradise for banking. Money commands a high rate of interest; deposits are large; and the drippings of the Treasury not inconsiderable, and there is no taxation. I only wonder that all the banks in the surrounding country have not petitioned for removal hither. While banks in the large cities of the State of New York pay an average of over 3½ per cent. for State and municipal taxes, and the average of such taxes throughout the United States exceeds 2½ per cent., only a license tax of fifty cents on a thousand dollars is imposed in the District of Columbia.

I object, Mr. Speaker, to the creation of any new banks, or the removal hither of those now established, so long as the result will give such advantage over other national banks located elsewhere. This bill is equivalent to a subsidy to the stockholders of this bank, over that of national banks located elsewhere, of $5,000 a year, and for twenty years, of over $100,000.

One of the great causes of complaint throughout this country against the national banking system is the restriction of advantages to a few men—the monopoly of it. If monopoly and special advantage is unjust, then we should not give so palpable an advantage to the stockholders of this bank.

I move that the bill be laid on the table.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman will not press that motion until the other side can be heard.

Mr. PHELPS. I did not yield to the gentleman from New York for any such motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has been speaking in the time of the gentleman from New Jersey.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHEELER. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of proceeding with the Army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay the bill upon the table is not pending, as the gentleman from New Jersey is entitled to the floor and states he did not yield to any such motion. Pending the consideration of the bill, the gentleman from New York moves to go into Committee of the Whole on the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. KELLOGG in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, a bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] is entitled to the floor, and has fifteen minutes remaining of his hour.

Mr. COBURN. This, as the committee is already aware, is not a proposition coming from the Military Committee to reduce the Army, or in any form a measure to provide for a systematic reduction, but merely to stop recruiting. And in that view, not having had sufficient preparation to see in what shape the reduction should be made just now, I wish to state that I most cordially concur in the suggestions made by the gentleman from New York, who reported this bill, and shall support a reasonable reduction in the appropriations for the Army, with a view to the cutting off in part the work of recruiting. I hope the Committee on Military Affairs will, in a few days, present a substantial scheme of reduction. I see no objection to any part of the bill, so far as appropriations are concerned. The Army may be reduced not only in men, as I think, but in officers; and not only in officers, but the expenditures of the military establishment may be reduced largely in public works and in munitions of war.

We are not, except in point of men, in point of personal, physical strength, a warlike nation. And while we are ready upon any just cause to defy any armed force, and take care of ourselves against all nations, at the same time we are not bound by any proper sense of public duty to make very great provision for war. The axiom that "in time of peace we should prepare for war" is not here applicable in the general sense as applied to armed monarchies, and to us only in a slight degree. We are rearing men, in the first place, to make ready for war on any and all occasions. So far the experiment has been successful. No nation that ever developed its military power upon a sudden call has surpassed our own. The experiment has been made on both sides, North and South, and for patience, courage, endurance, daring, everything that constitutes manhood in war, our people fall behind none. In all these respects this nation, North and South, proved its superiority to all others within the last ten years.

We have provided for the education and training of officers at our great Military Academy, who, in time of war, may drill, discipline, fit for the field, and lead to battle the men, the volunteers, who must constitute the body of every great American army. In addition we make and supply the best small-arms and ammunition of any nation to our soldiers.

What else have we to look to as a part of our military establishment? Fortifications along the sea-coast—something to prevent foreign inroads? How much of that can we undertake; how much of that need we provide? I think we are in no danger of invasion; that with the railroads which we have throughout our country, enabling great and sudden concentrations of troops, there is little danger that any hostile body of men from foreign lands will come to land upon our shores. All that we want to do is to provide upon the sea-coast some works, some fortifications, to prevent the great iron-clads of first-class military or naval powers from destroying our naval depots and our great cities. We ought to have a few of our important sea-coast cities and other important points taken care of by strong works. We ought to have strong fortifications in places like Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and a few other strategic points. We need there an ample supply of great guns. I think it would cost, according to the testimony of the Chief of Ordnance and the Chief of Engineers more than half a hundred million dollars to fortify amply our sea-coast on scientific principles. We cannot think of that just now; it is too much—too great an expenditure.

We can only, then, look to such care of our sea-coast as a great nation can readily bring to bear in case of emergency. What we want, in addition to few great forts of masonry, is to have a sufficient supply of great guns to protect such points as I have named, to be placed in such works of a temporary character as large bodies of men can erect on an emergency. The great rifled guns once provided are of the first importance for harbor defense.

The only other important work for our military establishment is to provide against attacks from, and to take care of, the Indians. Nothing else that I know of; and when we talk about the Indian question and the management of the Indians, it is not necessary to look to the appropriations for the Indian Bureau and to read of its operations; it is not necessary to go to the Interior Department and see there what the Indians cost us; but the great expenses of the Indians are found in the War Department. General Sheridan alone has sixteen thousand five hundred men under his command; and I venture the assertion will be sustained by the common sense of the House and the country when I say that not five hundred out of the sixteen thousand five hundred men in Sheridan's grand division are needed or used for anything else than as a police force against the Indians. There is where our Army is used; there is where it is necessary, and there is where it is almost alone necessary. The thirty regiments this hour on the frontier could be disbanded but for the Indians, and more than $16,000,000 of direct outlay for the soldiery alone saved, outside of the cost of the Indian Bureau. If I had the power, although I do not profess to have military knowledge and experience and ability sufficient to guide the House, or to guide any public action in that matter, I would take the risk, and strip our lakes, and strip our sea-shore, and strip the South of soldiers almost entirely, and what Army I retained in service I would keep on the Indian frontier. There is where it is needed almost entirely. And just here let me say, for fear I should forget it, that the testimony which has been read by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALBRIGHT] in relation to the use of soldiers against Indians applies and was applied by the witnesses not to all the Indians, but to a few tribes comparatively, the Sioux, the Kiowas, the Arapahoes, the Comanches, and the Apaches in Arizona. The fact about it is that not one Indian in four in this country is troublesome at all and needs the repression of military force.

But I was saying that if I had my way I would take the risk of having a very small garrison in these forts along the Atlantic sea-coast; a few men, a squad of men in each of the forts is all that we need there; a few men to hold possession and guard the places. The little force we have there now could do but little in time of actual war. New recruits, volunteers, must at all events come in and learn and do the duties of defense. This is inevitable without a great standing army. How are these forts occupied at present? By artillery chiefly; perhaps a small force of infantry can be found in some of them. Some of these posts are occupied by a whole company of artillery. In New York Harbor there is almost a regiment, costing the Government yearly $500,000. They are needed there for no earthly purpose for the present defense of the city, nor for the preservation of good order; they are there only as a stationary force, going through the infantry and the heavy-artillery drill. Thus, if we should have an Indian war and should need those men in the field, we could strip every one of these forts of the force now there, except a few men who may be necessary to prevent the destruction of public property, and this would be done. True enough, these trained men would be valuable in case of a foreign war, they would leaven the lump of our soldiery; but after all, we must rather rely upon trained officers than drilled men to do this work effectually.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALBRIGHT] said that it was necessary to keep a company of soldiers at these great fortifications to prevent their being destroyed. That, as I understand, is not necessary. The soldiers there do not work upon their repairs; that task is done by the Engineer Corps, having in its employ more than five thousand men engaged in erecting or repairing fortifications. How are your arsenals taken care of? Not by a company of men, but by ten or fifteen; perhaps less than that number at some of them; yet many of these arsenals contain property of very much more value than can be found in any one of these forts—large numbers of cannon and small-arms, great quantities of ammunition and ordnance stores.

I will now read letters from the Chiefs of Ordnance and Engineers, showing the number of enlisted men on duty:

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Brigadier-General and Chief of Engineers.

Hon. JOHN COBURN,
Chairman, Committee on Military Affairs, House of Representatives.

I submit, then, whether it is not totally unnecessary, so far as the care and preservation of these forts are concerned, to have artillery soldiers in them. And if that is all the use for the garrisons let there be a guard of a few men at each of them; and, except to this extent, let us strip our public works of soldiers.

What is the condition of things in the South? I have here a statement showing the number of men in the different military departments. Let us see how many men are needed in the South. A few years ago, perhaps a few months ago, it was necessary to keep troops there on account of the prevalence of disturbances; but I feel that now a time has arrived when public policy, as well as sound sense, dictates that troops shall in a great measure be withdrawn from that country. I believe that troops are necessary in the State of Louisiana only; I do think that at New Orleans there is a necessity for an armed force, perhaps a regiment.

Let me go back a moment and call the attention of the committee to the number of men we have in the East and in the Department of the Lakes. Eighteen hundred and twenty-six men are in this region along the sea-board, reaching from the south line of Virginia up to Canada, and reaching back no farther than Pennsylvania and New York. The Department of the Lakes has 629 men more, making in all about 2,450 men in the region reaching from Lake Michigan eastward, and south as far as the lower end of the Chesapeake Bay. Now, there seems to be no possible use in all this region for guard duty, outside of mere drill, for more than 800 men. All we require for that purpose is a few men in each fortification. A few hundred men at West Point, in the Engineers' battalion at Willet's Point, and on recruiting service, might do all the military duties required in that region for the present. Our system contemplates the use of the militia to meet all real emergencies, and not a standing army.

Now, let us turn our attention to the South. In the Department of the South, reaching from Virginia down to the borders of Louisiana, there are 2,192 soldiers. In the Department of the Gulf, including Mississippi, Louisiana, and Arkansas, there are 1,031 men, making 3,223 soldiers in the region reaching from this neighborhood around to Texas. In view of the reduction of the Army, it is a matter for the judgment of the House whether or not we need troops there; for if the Army is to be reduced, the troops must be taken either from the East, or from the South, or from the Indian country, or from the frontier of California or Texas.

As a matter of history, transpiring every day, we know that the disturbances in the South have in a large degree ceased. There is some testimony tending to show that in some districts in Tennessee, the Carolinas, Alabama, and Georgia, there is difficulty in collecting the internal revenue. But I find upon examination that the amount of revenue collected annually from any one of those districts will not, except in a very few instances, support a single company of soldiers. Every soldier costs about one thousand dollars annually; so that if you put in a district fifty or sixty soldiers, with their officers, they just about exhaust all the revenue that is raised there. What sense or reason can there be in retaining a military force in a district for the purpose of collecting revenue when the amount collected is all exhausted in supporting that force? Better not attempt to collect it at all. Better lose part by fraud than lose all by the employment of military power.

I now proceed to consider the Department of Texas. In that Department there are of cavalry 2,491, and of infantry 2,492. The investigations of the Military Committee tend to show that the number of hostile Indians in Texas and the troubles arising on the border require about all the force there is there. We have examined the Secretary of War, General Sherman, General Sheridan, Secretary Delano, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and various other officers, and the evidence goes to show that there is a disturbed region in Texas that has to be cared for. The tribes of Comanches, Kiowas, Arapahoes, and Cheyennes are mischievous and dangerous. They make raids into New Mexico and Texas; they make raids northward toward the Union Pacific Railroad, in the back settlements of Kansas and Colorado, and even into the peaceable parts of the Indian territory. So that there appears to be no way of dispensing with the troops in that region.

Go further north, then, along the line of the Union Pacific Railroad. Officers in charge seem to think it is necessary to keep troops there. Doubtless a force must be kept there. It is perfectly possible for these Indians to make raids north or south in that vast region of Western Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, and in Wyoming, and the territory lying north and west of that. So I see no possibility of reducing the force there. Going then further north and northeast, we come into the region of the Sioux Indians—an active, mischievous, and partially hostile set of tribes. East of them, in Minnesota and Dakota, are some twenty thousand peaceable Chippewas, quietly living on reservations, and requiring no restraint of military power worth naming.

The military posts near the Sioux border the Missouri River and extend up and around the bend of that river into Northeastern Montana, and then further west and south of that, running down to Utah. Here is a string of posts, encircling these great tribes of Sioux Indians, not to be dispensed with. These men need guarding against. These men need to have armed men surround them, and I can see no possibility there of withdrawing any military force; and from the best evidence it may be necessary to increase it somewhat; but that is a matter for the future, and I do not pretend to say what is advisable. There is a little difference of opinion as to that. General Sheridan says we can get along, and he can take charge of the Indians in his division and all disturbances with the army he has there now. I believe that can be done. The weight of testimony goes to show it is possible we can take care of the Indian troubles in Sheridan's division with his 16,500 men. In Sheridan's division are embraced almost all the troublesome and dangerous Indians in the country except those which are in Arizona; and the Apaches are the only ones there we need have any serious apprehension about. And the number of troops in Arizona military authorities go to show is amply sufficient. The number there at this time is 1,744.

Now, in the western part of Colorado there is a large reservation of Utes; but they are not regarded as dangerous or mischievous, and do not require any additional military force. These Utes this summer have made a treaty, by which they have disposed of and sold to the Government of the United States about one-third of all their reservations, amounting to about three acres of land, largely million mineral.

Going then beyond Arizona into California, we find peaceable Indians. Going northward into Nevada we find peaceable Indians. Going up into Idaho, and Oregon, and Washington we find comparatively peaceable Indians. There is no danger to be apprehended from them; and the presence of a small force of soldiers at occasional posts is all that is required. The judgment of some of the most intelligent men who have been there goes to the extent that a large part of the region which embraces Salt Lake as a center, a large country, embracing four hundred thousand square miles and a number of tribes, nearly a hundred, needs no repression of military force. I refer to the evidence of Major Powell, the explorer of the Colorado of the Pacific, who has visited and counted sixty-six tribes in that region; and a very interesting fact has been developed by him in connection with these tribes. He says we have been paying and supplying, taking care of, about 30,000 Indians, when according to actual count there are but about 10,000.

And, Mr. Chairman, I will say in this connection, the number of Indians has been very largely magnified at very many points in our country. It has been difficult to ascertain their true number, and I verily believe, from the testimony which is furnished, the numbers of the Sioux tribes will be found to be considerably smaller than we have supposed and estimated their number to be. So the apprehension the country has labored under from these tribes has been greater than it should have been.

Certainly, from what we have submitted to us on these points, I am led to believe that we might possibly diminish the force in California and Oregon. We had before us General Milroy, superintendent of the Indians in Washington Territory, and his testimony goes to show they are peaceable; that they are disposed to adopt the arts of civilized life; and in that region, so remote from settlement, they have very little of the savage and mischievous nature attributed to the wild and predatory tribes east of the mountains. So that, so far as any investigations we have made are concerned, taking the entire circuit of the Indian tribes, men who are dangerous, who are mischievous, who need the repression of military force, can be found in considerable numbers only in the places among the great Sioux tribes in Northern Texas, and the Apaches in Arizona.

But no one is so foolish as to say the troops shall be stripped from the entire frontier country. The process of consolidating these wild men upon reservations is going on, and in a short time we will solve this Indian question by placing them where they will cultivate the arts of civilized life. Major Powell avers that this can be done easily and peaceably with the tribes he visited, putting them all on four comparatively small reservations, where no force will be necessary to overawe them.

At present some reduction can be made in the Western Territories; but the greater reductions, if any are made, would most probably fall in the Department of the Lakes, on the Atlantic sea-board; in the Department of the South; and in the extreme West, on the Pacific coast. At Salt Lake City, perhaps, where a regiment is located, a half regiment might be dispensed with. I have made these suggestions now as to the positions of the Army, not for any action of the House—that is not a matter of legislation—but simply to call the attention of members to the reductions which are possible under the pressure of the present hour. We had fewer troops on the frontier some years ago than we have now. Finding less use for troops in the South, within a few years three regiments have been moved to the West. There was just as much danger from Indian inroads two, three, or four years ago as there is now. When this is taken in view, it occurs that the force might be diminished at several points in the Indian country. The testimony of those who have been on the ground goes largely to work the conviction that in an emergency troops can be dispensed with at several posts without exposing the settlers.

We had on the frontier in 1869 twenty-seven regiments; in 1870, twenty-eight; in 1871, twenty-seven; in 1872, twenty-eight; and now we have thirty regiments. It would seem that one or two regiments, more or less, would make little difference. The dangers of Indian inroads were greater four years ago, just after the construction of the Pacific Railroad, than now. The truth is, there are a few regiments stationed in those regions which have to be disposed of in some way; and they have been located at points no doubt judiciously, where they could be best used, under the discretion of the military commanders.

Let me call the attention of the committee now to the number, as far as we could ascertain it, of some of these Indian tribes which have to be guarded against. I will be very brief. According to the best testimony furnished this year, the number of Apaches is from eleven to twelve thousand; and this includes men, women, and children. And it is said now that the older members of these tribes are not hostile, are not disposed to carry on war; but the young men—perhaps one man in five, or one man in ten—are disposed to be mischievous. Taking, then, the number of Apache warriors to be about two thousand, there might be four or five hundred who would have to be watched and cared for; and the same ratio would apply to the Sioux tribes, and also to the Arapahoes, Cheyennes, Kiowas, and Comanches. There are said to be about eight thousand in these tribes. There are about fifty-three thousand wild or mischievous Sioux. This covers the really troublesome tribes. It is said on the best authority, so far as we can ascertain, that there are not over one thousand of the Sioux—that is young bucks, as they are called—that are really dangerous. They are well armed, and cannot be restrained from mischief by the older and more prudent men.

So the House can judge from these facts as to the necessity of the presence of a very great military force in that neighborhood, and so dispose of the real and only question for us to act on, and that is the furnishing the requisite number of troops. To expose the settlers would be an outrage, and no considerations of economy should for a moment stand in the way of their ample protection. After all, we deal with men in numbers and dollars in gross, and location and outlay are matters of administration.

What I have said has been on the hypothesis that a reduction of the Army was actually to be made. I discussed the possibilities and probabilities in that view, and in no other. I have no doubt the sentiment of the country is we must make a reduction of expenditures at all points, and the Army can be no exception to that rule; retrenchment can begin at no safer point. But what has been said as to the location of the Army, what has been said as to its effectiveness, or what is proposed to be done by it in future, has been said not as a criticism upon the control and management of the Army; for, so far as I know or from what appears in any testimony adduced before us, that management has not only been good, but may be said to have been admirable, as to the position of the troops, forces, and posts.

Mr. Chairman, there is a reduction going on in the Army all the time. We need not act positively by discharges, by mustering out, by breaking up organizations, or in any other way, for that matter; for a great reduction is going on from natural causes. According to the evidence of the Adjutant-General of the Army, his statement as to the reduction of the Army, which I hold in my hand, is astonishing. It was so to me, as it was to other members of the committee. During the last year more than half the Army has gone out of service. There have died 481 men; there have been discharged by expiration of service 4,187 men, for disability 1,113 men, for other causes 2,281 men; deserted 7,813 men, making an aggregate of almost 16,000 men. The yearly average of casualties of Army officers is 83. So, without the passage of the law, a stopping of recruiting would diminish the Army more than one-half. Therefore, if the House decides to reduce the Army, no officer, no man in the service, need be alarmed lest he is going to be put out and lose his position, as a great many officers apprehended they would, and thus be obliged to go out and make a living in the ordinary way at a time of life when they are totally unfit to do it. Eighty-three constitute officers enough for several regiments. There can be, therefore, no trouble and no apprehension on the part of Army officers. Regiments may be consolidated, and those officers who are supernumeraries, or who may belong to regiments that are dispensed with, can be assigned to others that are kept in existence, and discharge duties there. This has been done, and there is no difficulty at all about that. I think it possible that a measure of that kind may be submitted to the House.

I now want to show the committee what Secretary Belknap says about a reduction of the Army:

Question. How much of reduction would the cessation of recruiting cause in the number of enlisted men annually?

Answer. The number to be enlisted next year, estimated by the Adjutant-General, is 12,300 men; the number of men required at the date of his estimate to fill the Army was 1,854; the number of discharges by expiration of service in the next fiscal year is 691; the estimated number of deserters, deaths, &c., during the same period, is 3,842; the number to be enlisted, 12,300. Mr. WHEELER'S estimate for recruiting, as I understand, was based on the recruiting of 7,000 men instead of 12,000. He obtained this information from the Adjutant-General, based on the idea that instead of recruiting 12,000 the succeeding year he would recruit 7,000, throwing off 5,000 men; and the cost of recruiting is about twenty dollars for each man.

Q. Then there is added to this the cost of transporting them to their regiments. Have you any idea how much that will average?

A. The twenty dollars includes transportation. The cost of recruiting each man and of his transportation to the depot has averaged, for several years, twenty dollars. It does not include clothing, but only recruiting and transportation.

The committee will therefore see that this operation of cutting down the Army is going on from natural causes. All we need to do just now, in order to accomplish this object, is to stop recruiting. The Committee on Military Affairs may, and I hope they will, take up this subject, continue it further, and adjust this matter as to officers as well as men. But with a practical measure like this it would be folly to refuse to support it, as it can be followed by systematic action. There are some matters in connection with the official part of the Army that might, in my judgment, be changed. For example, adjutants and quartermasters of regiments are supernumerary officers. Formerly lieutenants were detailed from the line and did this duty. They can do so now, according to the evidence of several of the most prominent and intelligent officers of the Army, as well as the Secretary of War. The permanent and recruiting parties, which now amount to nine hundred and sixty-two men, according to the evidence of General Sherman and others, can be largely reduced. So too with the battalion of Engineers. I read from the testimony of General Sherman:

You may limit the number of men allowed to the Engineer Battalion, or you may limit the number of men about recruiting stations, and more especially the numbers who are counted as soldiers, but in fact are clerks, (four hundred and eighty-one, I think,) and you can save 50 per cent. on these figures without impairing the efficiency of the Army itself.

There can be a reduction of the clerical force in the War Department and at posts.

I will now call the attention of the committee to what the Secretary of War says in relation to a reduction:

Question. In view of the possible reduction of the Army, can the number of clerks and other civil employés and enlisted men detailed for extra duties in the War Department and in the Quartermaster's Department, and in all those great departments, be diminished?

Answer. A very beneficial change can be made in the War Department. The chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana, has prepared a bill, which I have seen, which reduces the clerical force in the War Department some two hundred. It increases the pay of some of the higher officers, especially the chief clerk, whose pay, I think, should be increased, for he is a very hard-working officer. But it reduces the number of employés, and makes a very material reduction of expenditures. I am satisfied that if that bill, or a similar one, should pass, the work of the Department would be expedited and it would be demonstrated that we have too many employés there. The Adjutant-General's Office is very hard pushed, and though Mr. WILLIAMS's bill reduces the force there somewhat, yet other branches of the Department could stand it much better than the Adjutant-General's. There is an immense amount of work growing out of the war which that office has to perform. But in regard to the employés generally throughout the country of the War Department, they could be reduced.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you any calculations or estimates going to show whether the number of employés in the Quartermaster's Department, some six thousand, can be cut down?

Secretary BELKNAP. They can be cut down in all the Departments, in my judgment. I have cut them down from time to time. I have a statement here showing that in 1870, shortly after I became Secretary of War, I reduced the number of animals, horses and mules, and also the number of employés very materially. I have done it a second time since, and I have taken steps to do it a third time.

Thus we see the clerical force can be reduced about two hundred in the War Department, and that a large force of employés in the Quartermaster's Department may, as it has been, be dispensed with. There are also general-service men, some of whom can be discharged. Commissary sergeants are mentioned to the number of one hundred and fifty-two; they, it is suggested, may be dispensed with.

I have thus called the attention of the House in a summary and general way to the location of the Army and the possible reduction of troops by reason of changes in its stations, and to the possible changes and reductions that may be made in the official branches of certain parts of the War Department. This, however, is a matter which requires a more thorough and extended investigation. For the present, whatever is proposed by way of reduction of expenditure by the Committee on Appropriations, I, as one of the members of the Committee on Military Affairs who have given some attention to these matters, heartily indorse and approve. I think we can do nothing more judicious at this time than to concur in the main with the report of the committee.

I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. SCUDDER.]

Mr. SCUDDER, of New Jersey. I have the impression, Mr. Chairman, that the committee will be found ultimately to be mistaken in some of their views as to the necessity or propriety of the reduction of the Army. But, notwithstanding that present impression, I shall cheerfully go with them in any measure of economy and reform which they have presented, or shall hereafter think proper to propose.

The great difficulty that we labor under is, that we suppose that our communications with the rest of the world are of that character that peace will always be maintained. Our difficulty, or if not a difficulty, our situation, is this: that our commercial relations with all parts of the world are daily and hourly growing more intimate. We start from the city of New York, go westward across this continent to the Pacific Ocean, and then go to the East Indies. That extended commercial relation necessarily brings us in close contact in commerce and in business with other nations, and will bring about collisions.

We have a large and extended coast, which necessarily requires some troops for fortifications. These fortifications should not be empty. They should be places for drill and exercise.

We have then a vast frontier with Mexico. We are on the borders of a state which is in a constant condition of volcanic eruption—such a condition, that it has often been proposed that we should exercise some protectorate power over that territory. We have also hostile Indians on our borders, and we have in addition to that a large and extended immigration coming to this country, and the bold and restless young men of our own people seeking homes in the far West. Under this state of circumstances, it seems to me hardly possible that we can safely rely on a permanent reduction of the Army.

The Army stands in this condition: it is the nucleus of a great organization, a nucleus of great value and importance for enforcing discipline, and which will enable our people in time of great emergency readily to rally around a common standard, with good officers and an efficient organization, for the common defense or for aggression, if necessary.

Now, Mr. Chairman, under that state of circumstances the committee have thought proper to reduce the estimates about $6,000,000, to reduce the Army to about twenty-five thousand men; leaving, if we consider the situation of affairs, about one soldier for every twenty-five hundred men within our borders. Under those circumstances there is no danger whatever from a standing army; no danger of the intimidation of our people; no danger of a power that will overawe us, but that army becomes the nucleus around which discipline, order, and in time of trouble, victory may come. We are all aware that when our Army went into Mexico, with generals of the regular Army and volunteers, the time came when the volunteers appealed to the men of West Point, and said, "Drill us, and prepare us for this emergency;" and the effect of the discipline thus brought about was, that the Army marched in triumph from Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico, with a degree of order, discipline, and power which astonished the world.

I have thought proper to make these remarks with the idea that the American people, as well as all the other people of the world, are fighting people; that the millennium has not come and will not come for a long time, when universal peace will shroud the world; and that it is necessary to keep up our military organization upon the basis on which it now is, and take the very first opportunity to enlarge, increase, and strengthen it.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Chairman, it is in the consideration of the appropriation bills that the people are brought to an examination of the conduct of those to whom they have delegated the trusts of Government. When the Executive Departments demand of us the means that they deem necessary to the due execution of their agency, it behooves us, who are the Representatives of the people, to inquire into the expediency and necessity of the estimates they submit. The events of the past twelve months; the recent demand of the Executive Departments of the Government for an increase of taxation; the admitted fact that the Secretary of the Treasury is daily adding to our immense volume of debt; that within less than four months this debt has been increased about $25,000,000; and that a deficiency in the revenues of over $40,000,000 is before us, all are facts which have brought the people seriously to the consideration of the questions, What shall be the administrative character of our Government? Shall it be one noted for its splendor and magnificence, or for its simplicity and purity? Shall it be one for the favored few, protected, enriched, and advanced by special and class legislation, or one wherein "equal and exact justice is done to all, and exclusive privileges granted to none?"

I did not participate in the recent discussion in this House on the salary question. Had I done so, I would have antagonized the position assumed by gentlemen in favor of high salaries. I was opposed last March, as I am now, to the increase of salaries. The indebted condition of the country did not warrant the passage of the act of March, 1873, and the tendency of the measure in all of its details, from the highest to the lowest officer benefited by its provisions, was to make a splendid and luxurious Government. It was the passage of this measure, following rapidly the exposé of the Credit Mobilier, that more particularly arrested the attention of the country to the increase of its expenditures, and to the growth of abuses which have crept into nearly all of its Departments.

There can be no question of the earnestness of the people in their demands for retrenchment and reform in the Government, and their determination to purify and simplify the character of its administration.

Without asking or considering what may be our individual fates in the future, let us, Mr. Chairman, look at these demands and this determination, and see if they be not such as, in our characters as citizens, anxious to perpetuate free institutions and a popular form of government, as an inheritance for those who are to succeed us, meet the concurrence of our judgment, and such, particularly, as that, in our character as Representatives and servants of the people, require our approval. This is the duty I now propose to myself. It is appropriate, in the consideration of one of the appropriation bills. I repeat, the Executive Departments of the Government demand of the people in the way of taxes, by these bills, what in their opinion is necessary to the discharge of the agency with which they have been invested. They submit their estimates. In their consideration there are two proper questions to be solved: first, their necessity; secondly, the means and resources of the people. Grouping the two questions together, the consideration of these bills means an inquiry into the state and condition of the whole country, in making which we will necessarily solve the propriety of the complaints of the people and the justice of their demands.

What, then, is the state and condition of the country? Turning first to the census tables for 1870, we find the total population of the United States and Territories to be 38,558,371. Out of this number of 38,558,371 people there are of those over ten years of age, but 12,505,923 engaged in all classes of occupation. And this number so "engaged in all classes of occupation" is divided, as appears from the report of the Superintendent of the Census, as follows:

Professional and personal	2,684,793
Trade and transportation	1,191,238
Manufacturing, mining, and mechanical	2,707,421

Before making any comment upon this table let us go a step further and look to the amount of public indebtedness and public taxation which rests upon these classes.

Quoting again from the report of the Superintendent of the Census, 1870, I find—

National indebtedness	$2,406,562,372
State and municipal indebtedness	868,676,758
Total	3,435,239,130

When you reflect that this amount does not include the private and individual indebtedness of the citizen, and especially that part incurred for works of improvement by him directly, you will agree that this is indeed a heavy load upon the producing classes of this country.

Going yet a step further, we find the annual burdens resting upon these classes to be—I again quote from same report—

Taxation, 1870, national	$411,255,479
Taxation, 1870, State and municipal	281,180,312

Speaking in round numbers, it would appear, Mr. Chairman, from these statistics, that the labor of the producing classes in this country pays annually for the support of their national and local governments $700,000,000—a large and oppressive amount; one that no wise statesman would increase; one that a prudent and wise people would make haste to decrease. But does this amount rest upon the labors of the twelve millions, as separated and classified by the Superintendent of the Census? The actual producers of wealth do not number ten millions. I am not one of those who make war upon the professional laborer or those engaged in trade. They perform useful and necessary aid to the actual producers; but yet, in considering those who bear the burdens to which I have referred, we must regard only him who, in very truth creates the harvest out of which you gather your tithes. We are considering the complaints, and determining their justice.

In so far as this vast amount of indebtedness has been created in maintaining the nationality of the Government, there is, and will be, no complaint; but where it has been increased in utter disregard of the condition of the country, to magnify offices, to create sinecures, to favor classes, and to encourage luxury and splendor, or, worse still, where it has been done, as in most of the Southern States, for corrupt and oppressive purposes, it has been, and ever will be, a matter of surprise that the people have so long slumbered; and it is now a matter for deep congratulation that they are awakened, and are likely to be severe in their condemnation of these abuses. The country is familiar with the mode and manner of the increase of indebtedness of the Southern States and municipalities since the war. But it is not with the increase in the number of officers and increase of pay made here in the National Government. I do not now mention defaults, peculations, or losses.

Sir, within the last few years new offices, new ranks, new districts, with increase of salaries, seem to have been "in the regular order of things." The salaries of your judges have been twice increased; the salaries of your officers in the Army and Navy have been increased; the salaries of your officers on the civil list have been increased. And without going into details or entering into what might be termed partisan comparison, I propose to demonstrate this unnecessary extravagance and increase by a comparison of expenditures of years since the close of the war.

Before doing so, it may not be inappropriate to refer to statements made by the leaders of the republican party within the last year, to the end that these gentlemen having claimed credit for their party in the matter of reduction, that party may be held to responsibility for any failure to make it. Those of us who were present will not forget the careful, able, and eloquent speech made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations on the 23d day of January, 1872, when he opened the discussion on the appropriation bills. I refer to that speech:

> The expenditure of revenue forms the grand level from which all heights and depths of legislative action are measured. The increase and diminution of the burdens of taxation depend alike upon their relation to this level of expenditures. That level once given, all other policies must conform to it and be determined by it. The expenditure and distribution of revenue, therefore, form the best test of the health, the wisdom, and virtue of a government. Is a government corrupt; that corruption will inevitably, sooner or later, show itself at the door of the Treasury in demand for expenditures.

These are words of wisdom and statesmanship uttered by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, as I believe in all sincerity. They are pregnant with truth; and no less by their truth, than their utterance by that gentleman, is the party in power to be tried and judged. They were made to invite the attention of the country to the assured fact urged by him, that his party was addressing themselves to a reduction of the expenditures of the Government. In fact, at a later period in his speech he says:

> We have not yet gone over all the appropriation bills, the eleven which we are required to present for the action of this House, but we have gone so nearly over them that I am able to state in general terms what the result will be. I hope we shall, in those eleven bills, be able to reduce the appropriations about $9,000,000 from the appropriations of last year. The total appropriations of last year in those bills amounted in round numbers to $160,000,000. The total appropriations we shall recommend in the same eleven bills this year, I hope, will not exceed $151,000,000; perhaps they may be a little less, even, than that sum. These appropriations of $151,000,000 will be understood to be outside of what are known as permanent appropriations. The permanent appropriations include the public debt in its various forms and some other form of charges, which we find will be reduced about $9,000,000 from the amount appropriated last year. The amount for the fiscal year 1871 was $182,302,243; the amount for the fiscal year 1872 is estimated at $163,601,861; the amount for the fiscal year 1873 is estimated at $154,961,237.

The committee claimed to have reduced the estimates for 1873 $3,000,000. When this statement was made, Mr. BECK said:

> With the gentleman's consent, I would like to say a single word. I worked for two years on the Committee on Appropriations of the last Congress; and it was as stingy a committee as I ever saw. The consequence was that a deficiency bill of $11,000,000 had to be brought in, and the gentleman's committee will have to do the same thing as soon as the presidential election is over.

The gentleman from Kentucky was right, as the tables and documents to which I shall hereafter refer will show.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it will be seen upon reference to the statements made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that the amount estimated for the expenditures of the Government, independent and outside of the expenditures of the Government on account of permanent appropriations, for the year 1873 were $151,000,000. They were, in fact, $173,495,015.55; and, as predicted by the gentleman from Kentucky, at the next session were followed by a deficiency appropriation. It will further be seen that the gentleman promised the people a continued reduction. In the speech referred to already, the gentleman from Ohio said for this promised reduction:

> I know it is not safe to attempt to forecast the future; but I venture to express the belief that, if peace continues, the year 1876 will witness our ordinary expenditures, exclusive of the public debt, reduced to $125,000,000, and the interest on the public debt to $95,000,000—making our total expenditures, exclusive of payment on the principal of the public debt, $230,000,000.

In the light of subsequent events, and with the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury for the year 1875—amounting to over $319,000,000—it is believed the gentleman will recall his prediction.

The appropriations for the year 1874 were $197,920,297.38, an increase of $46,000,000 more than the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations—the keeper of the key of the public Treasury—deemed necessary for the support of the Government in 1873. What was there, what has there been, in the condition of the country to demand this large increase? Is it "that a government being corrupt, that corruption will inevitably, sooner or later, show itself at the door of the Treasury in demand for expenditures?" Are we not confronted with the fact, as already referred to, that within the last few months the Secretary of the Treasury has, in the exercise of questionable authority, increased the public debt about $25,000,000? I pause, to call attention to the fact that a little over one year ago it was claimed by the then Secretary of the Treasury that the public debt was being reduced; that public expenditures were being decreased; and that public taxation was being lessened. The country believed the statement; but time, with its inexorable logic, has shown that the public debt is being increased, that public expenditures are growing and multiplying, and that more taxes—even on the necessaries of life—are being demanded. Shall I repeat the words of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, "That the expenditures and distribution of revenue form the best test of the health, the wisdom, and virtue of a government?" Tried by this most sound rule, what must be the judgment of the people upon that party who are alone responsible for this condition?

In defense of the enormous amount of our yearly expenditures, much has been charged to the recent civil war, and the state of circumstances growing out of it, and this has been deemed an all-sufficient answer to each and every comparison made of the expenses of the Government prior and subsequent to that period. I propose, Mr. Chairman, in addition to the comparison I have already made of the estimates for 1873 and those of 1874, in which and by which a large increase is shown, to invite your attention to another comparison which I think will show more conclusively than any other this growing cancer of public expenditures.

By the act of the 4th of July, 1836, it is made the duty of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives to prepare at the close of each session of Congress statements showing, first appropriations made during the session; secondly, of Offices created, and the salaries thereof; and thirdly, the offices the salaries of which have been increased.

Before calling attention specifically to the facts shown by these reports, allow me to say that a reference is made to them, not with a view of assailing the action of the Committee on Appropriations, but with a view of holding responsible the party who have had, during this period of time, the control of the expenditures of the Government. We fix this responsibility upon the party by an examination of what they have done. It is right to assume that what they appropriate in any given year is all that is required for the expenditures of that year, if honestly made. Now, turning to these reports, we find (I quote from Mis. Doc. No. 84, Thirty-ninth Congress, second session) the following appropriations made for the year ending June 30, 1868:

It will be seen, as you follow the appropriations actually made, and when you come to look at the bills as footed up by the cashier and charged to the people, that there has been a gradual and steady increase—one hundred and forty-five millions in 1868; one hundred and ninety-seven millions in 1874, and an equal number of millions demanded for 1875, its grand total being more. Are we, in view of these facts, on the road to reduction and economy? The gentleman from Ohio, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, for whose intelligence and familiarity with the details of Government expenditures I have a very high opinion, promised us from his official position in 1872 that when the year 1876 came we would reach the level of just expenditures, which he then placed at one hundred and twenty-five millions yearly appropriations and ninety-five millions permanent appropriations. Can he now promise the country as much?

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me to correct the gentleman on one figure. The gentleman has correctly copied what is printed in the report made by the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House, of new offices and appropriations actually made, and he makes a total of $197,920,000 made during the last session of Congress. I notice among the items given, by which he arrives at that figure, for the Post-Office Department, $32,529,167. Now, it is perfectly well known that we did not appropriate any such sum as that out of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department. We appropriate out of the Treasury only the deficit of revenues below the expenditures, and for the current year this deficit was about $6,500,000. Now, the gentleman has presented the whole $32,500,000, which includes all the revenues of the Post-Office Department, as an appropriation made by Congress. Now, the gentleman, instead of $32,500,000, should have charged to Congress $6,500,000, the difference being $26,000,000, which he needs to subtract from his $197,000,000 in order to show the appropriations made by Congress at its last session.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. For the very reason that some gentlemen might attempt to mislead the country on this point, I have invited the attention of those who shall do me the honor to read my remarks to a comparison between the years 1868 and 1873. They will find that while in 1868 the expenses of the Government amounted in round numbers to $145,000,000, and last year we appropriated $197,000,000, in 1868 we appropriated $19,000,000 for the Post-Office Department, and last year nearly $33,000,000. I again ask the gentleman, can he now promise the country as much as he did in the speech to which I have referred?

Mr. GARFIELD. After the vote yesterday in relation to public buildings and grounds, I fear not.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I repeat that that gentleman, in fixing the appropriations in his eleven bills, for the year 1873, at $151,000,000, and promising further reductions, certainly fixed that amount as the proper level of expenditures in the then condition of the country. Congress, in 1867, for the year 1868, as is seen, fixed $145,162,789.97 as the proper level. Why is it, Mr. Chairman, that now, in less than seven years, they have swelled $50,000,000 beyond this amount? Interest upon your public debt has been decreased. The amount for pensions has not been increased, as will be seen by comparing the pension appropriations for 1868, which were $33,280,000, and those of 1874, which were $30,480,000. These years have been years of peace, and, until the panic of last September, years of commercial and industrial prosperity. There has been no legitimate demand, nor is there any legitimate excuse, for an increase of expenditures.

Let us make another comparison, which will make evident that this increase of expenditures is not properly chargeable to the civil war and its consequences. That comparison is by excluding the items "war," "navy," "pensions," and "permanent appropriations," and taking only the items "Indians" and "miscellaneous," (as shown by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made to the present session,) for the years 1868, 1869, 1870, 1871, 1872, and 1873:

Presenting an increase during the administration of the republican party from and upon their own management of the expenditures, in these two items, of over $24,000,000, and that, too, in five years' time. With this increase, and the startling fact that for miscellaneous purposes alone over $73,000,000 per year are expended, is it at all surprising that the people should be aroused and awakened? Is it at all surprising that they should demand an account of those to whom they have delegated the control of their Government? Can the party in power successfully explain why these results? Sir, their very attempt now to remedy and retrench these abuses in the administration convicts them of unfaithfulness to the people in this regard in the times that are past. The people will not be slow to understand that if you can now remedy, you failed to exercise the power with which they clothed you heretofore; and they will not be slow to conclude that to reach "the economic level of expenditures" they must select other administrators of the Government.

Let the people reflect that this item of $73,000,000 excludes the amount they pay for the Army, the amount they pay for the Navy, the amount they pay for the Indian Department, the amount they pay for pensions, and the amount they pay for permanent appropriations, and that it is more than the entire expenses of any year of the Government, under any administration when the country was not involved in war; and as the people reflect, let us, Mr. Chairman, answer them frankly that the expenditures are too large, and that their complaints are just. Let us as their Representatives, meeting their just expectations, resolve that neither by bond or tax will we add to the weight of the burdens already too heavy to be by them patiently borne, and that we will by the severest retrenchment take care that these burdens shall be reduced and lightened.

A thought or two in this connection I deem appropriate. I have stated already that seven hundred millions were annually levied and collected from the labor of not more than the number engaged in all classes of occupation, principally from the agricultural, mining, manufacturing, and mechanical classes—less than ten millions of our population charged with the support of the non-producers, nearly three-fourths of our total population! What more do these classes pay? By bounties secured and concealed under your revenue laws, by privileges granted and used under your currency laws, by rights and special franchises conferred upon railroads, you are legalizing tithes upon their labor equal in amount to that paid by them for the support of their national and local governments; or, stated in other terms, the labor of the producers of wealth in this country is taxed per annum seven hundred millions for the support of their national and local governments, are taxed to pay bounties to the protected classes, are taxed to pay tribute to favored money-changers, are taxed to foster and enrich monopolies, created by the empires of territory your indulgence has ceded to them, and which should have been reserved as homes for their children.

Sir, the people are at last awakened to these great abuses and wrongs, and they demand their reformation by all the means known to our laws and form of government; and I have to say for the party of which I am a member, it must make haste to enter upon this duty. We must grapple as one man with these giant questions, and resist the growth of expenditures, and retrench them. We must resist special and protective legislation, and disenthrall the labor of the country from its serfdom to the favored classes. We must teach those who claim immunity under charters that while the rights of all citizens will be respected, and we will see to it that no wrong is done any one of them, yet no agent of the people, whether in national or local legislature, can barter away the public safety and the public life, and make these the property of a few individuals. And I say to those who control the democratic party that if they should hesitate or delay in the discharge of this duty the aroused people will demand other agents and commission them to the performance of it. The work must be done, and speedily, if we would preserve what is dear to the heart of every American, no matter where he may reside—the form of popular government and the character of American institutions.

I am no alarmist, Mr. Chairman; but I cannot resist the belief that two active forces are at work which threaten the ultimate destruction of the Government, and a change in its character, and these are represented in the ideas of centralization and communism; and it behooves the patriotism and conservatism of the country to combine in order to arrest these expenses. It can only be done by bringing content to the public mind, and that can only be done by making your legislation and government, in all of its departments, conform to equality, justice, and integrity.

But, leaving the discussion of the currency and revenue to other occasions, I return to the immediate question before us—appropriations for the support of the Government. Where and how shall we retrench? Let me answer briefly. In your Navy; abolish useless navy-yards and reduce the pay of officers. In your Army; reduce its numbers and the pay of its officers. In the civil Departments; abolish useless customs districts, costing more than they yield; get rid of all unnecessary officers and employés; reduce salaries and fees everywhere; reduce your foreign-intercourse list; see to it that contracts are faithfully and honestly let; reform your Indian policy. Do all this, not with the idea of a splendid government, but one simple in form, economic in character, and whose existence is to be perpetuated, not by its magnificence, but by its virtue, wisdom, and justice.

Mr. Chairman, the views and opinions I have now advanced are not new ones with me; for nearly coeval with my entrance upon duty as a Representative upon this floor, I declared my views upon what I deemed should be the administrative character of the Government. This was done upon the proposition to amend post-office bills, to grant subsidies to mail steamships, in the second session of the Forty-second Congress. I beg leave to quote from a speech I had then the honor to make upon this floor these words:

> Now, sir, it is said that we will build up a splendid government. When you build up or erect a splendid government, in my judgment, Mr. Chairman, that very moment you build it up at the expense of the liberties of the people. We are referred to the example of older countries. Go and mark the history of the past. Let that history pass under your review, and you will find that whenever there has been erected a splendid and luxurious government, that the moment you write its brightest history, you write it at the expense of the laboring people of that country.
> It will not do to refer me to the flag of Saint George. Go rather and tell this people to live humbly; to live simply; to live within their means, and to build up no favored or special class within the limits of their government. When you do that, you have made your citizens happy; you have made your citizens prosperous. You have made not a splendid government, but a government where the people may live free and enjoy their rights. It is such a government I desire to see in this country.

And, for myself, I claim that whatever record I have made as a servant of the people has been in strict accord with these views; and, so far as I may know how, I intend faithful adherence to them now and hereafter.

I have now, sir, a word to add in reply to the remark of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations a few moments since, that he could not answer for the correctness of his prediction after the vote taken yesterday in relation to public buildings and grounds. Sir, I voted with the chairman yesterday; but I learned a lesson from that vote of yesterday. I see from the remarks of gentlemen on this floor, I see from the character of the reports made by the Committee on Appropriations, that if retrenchment is to be made it is not by abolishing useless offices, not by reducing the expense of the civil Government here; but that if economy is to be had at all, it is to be had by the East and North taking away necessary, useful, and proper appropriations for the West and South. Your retrenchment is to come in that shape and in that form. I stand ready to vote with you for any proposition of real economy whenever and wherever made; but do not make us witnesses to the fact that your sectional jealousy is touched, or that your combination of capital and power is touched, and that while you deny justice to the West and South you will not retrench or reform abuses here in the East.

I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Nevada, [Mr. KENDALL.]

Mr. KENDALL. Mr. Chairman, it is utterly impossible for me to review the whole question here presented in the short time yielded to me by the courtesy of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE.] But I desire here and now in few words to enter my earnest protest against any reduction of appropriations to maintain the Army in full force as it now exists, at least upon our western frontiers. While I agree with the gentleman who has just taken his seat, that there is small necessity for a military force in most of the Southern States, I must earnestly urge upon the attention of this committee that you cannot reduce the force of the Army along our western frontier—along those long lines of settlement extending from Texas in the south to Montana and Washington Territory in the north—without endangering the safety of those settlements and the lives of a people who found that vast country a wilderness, and have built up instead prosperous, powerful, and advancing commonwealths.

I was surprised yesterday, exceedingly surprised, to hear the declaration made by the gentleman from New York, a member of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. WHEELER,] that—

> If there be any force in the legal maxim that a private inconvenience ought to give way to a great public benefit, these daring adventurers ought, if necessary, to come within the limits of civilization, until, at least, we are better able to protect them.
> We hear a great deal about the contraction of the currency. A contraction of our population is quite as desirable, if not necessary. The Government certainly ought not to encourage further expansion, especially when an army must precede and follow it.

Sir, are these sentiments to be heard in an American Congress, representing a people first in progressive energy and high spirit of enterprise among the nations of the earth? What is the object or purpose of our Army? Is it merely to protect the old settlements along the Atlantic sea-board? Sir, I had supposed that the brave and indomitable spirit of our hardy pioneers who go forth, for your benefit, to explore, to reclaim, and to beautify new lands, deserved encouragement. I had supposed that the "daring adventurers" who have dug from the western mountains the gold and silver that carried you successfully through the war against the rebellion and enabled you to maintain the credit of the Government at home and abroad, were deserving of some consideration, protection, and encouragement at your hands. I had hardly expected to hear such a sentiment announced upon this floor, that the people upon our frontiers should withdraw from the homes that they with difficulty have reared, and return to the older and more permanently settled portions of the country.

If such sentiments had prevailed heretofore, instead of a country extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific shore, we would even now be thinly scattered colonies, shut in between the Atlantic and the crest of the Alleghanies. But I rejoice that such a sentiment finds little response here; and certainly none whatever among the liberal and intelligent people of either the East or the West.

It is said by some who have spoken here to-day that a reduction of the Army on the frontiers is recommended by the Secretary of War. No, sir; such is not the fact. For what purpose was held the consultation by the Committee on Military Affairs of this House with General Sherman, Adjutant-General Townsend, and the Secretary of War? Was it for the purpose of obtaining information? And is that information thus obtained set forth correctly in this document laid before us this morning? I have it here in my hand. It is styled "Notes of Consultation by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives with General W. T. Sherman, Adjutant-General Townsend, the Secretary of War, &c." Is it the purpose and object of this committee to be governed or guided by the views of these officers of the Government? Do they recommend any reduction of the force of the Army on the frontier? General Sherman says:

> I have no doubt that we occupy a great many posts in the Indian country to-day which next week, or the week after, we may abandon with profit, but which cannot be abandoned by an order from Washington without exposing life and property.
> I have in my hand a statement prepared by the Adjutant-General of the Army, which indicates every post from which post returns are made. I have not made up this statement myself, and would have to go over each item in order to answer your question fully, and I rather think that that is more than you expect. This paper gives a list of every post from which post returns are made. Detachments may be, and often are, sent out from those posts to other points not named herein, but they are called back again. These constitute the regular posts. For instance, the First Cavalry occupies Benicia Barracks, California; Fort Klamath, Oregon; Camp McDermot, Nevada; Fort Lapwai, Indian Territory; Fort Walla Walla, Washington Territory; Camp Harney, Oregon, and Camp Halleck. These are six or seven distinct posts, stretched from our northern boundary down into Nevada, a distance of about eight or nine hundred miles of frontier, right in the midst of Indians. Now for me, or for the Secretary of War, or for the President of the United States, to order a discontinuance of any one of these posts would be simply to expose life and property in the neighborhood to immediate danger. Therefore I answer that question in the negative. We cannot order the discontinuance of any of these forts.

I continue to read from this document:

> The CHAIRMAN. State whether or not the Indians there are hostile in their conduct and character.
> General SHERMAN. They are of a mischievous nature; semi-hostile; and would be converted into hostile the very moment troops are withdrawn. Some people trust them. I do not. We did trust the Modocs, and we got the worst of it.
> The Second Cavalry occupies Fort Sanders, Wyoming Territory, Fort Fred Steele, Camp Stambaugh, Camp Brown, Camp Douglass, Fort Laramie, and Fort Ellis, with a detachment at Omaha Barracks. That regiment is, therefore, strung from the Pacific Railroad, in the neighborhood of Cheyenne, northward through the Rocky Mountains up to Fort Ellis in Montana, at least eight hundred miles of frontier. They are in the presence of probably three thousand of the most dangerous and hostile Indians on this continent.

I read further. General Sherman continues:

> The Fifth Cavalry is now in Arizona.

My friend from Arizona [Mr. MCCORMICK] suggests that I read this as illustrating the condition of the Territory he so ably and faithfully represents.

> The Fifth Cavalry is now in Arizona. It can hardly be said to be occupying any place, as it is on the go all the time. It has detachments at Camp Verde, Camp Apache, Camp Bowie, Camp MacDowell, Camp Grant, Camp Lowell, and Fort Whipple. It occupies the whole valley of the Gila, with detachments at the foot of the White Mountains, near the capital of Arizona, which is called Prescott. This regiment, I have no doubt, has had harder service within the last two years than any regiment of cavalry had in the service of the United States during the civil war. It numbers about nine hundred and thirty-five men, according to this list, but there are in the field probably about eight hundred men. Under the leadership of General Crook, it has subdued the wild Apaches, who are now as much afraid of this regiment as Indians ought to be afraid of our soldiers. General Crook, with this regiment and some infantry, has restored comparative peace to that country; not peace exactly, but such peace only as can exist in that miserable desert land. If you, gentlemen, will get Mexico to take Arizona back, I will agree to knock two regiments of cavalry from our estimates. But, as Tom Corwin used to say, "It is our country, and therefore we must love it and protect it."

Here, perhaps, I owe an apology to my friend from Arizona for reading too far and too much. [Laughter.]

Without indorsing all these statements as regards the character of that Territory, which, as I have already remarked, is represented so faithfully by my friend at my side, I would say that, in my belief, the operations carried on by General Crook in Arizona have done more to open up that Territory, abounding, as I think, in vast resources, than all the maudlin sentiment and pious exhortations of your eastern Pecksniffs and pseudo philanthropists, so lavishly expended from the organization of the peace commission down to yesterday, when all the people of Arizona were kindly advised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] to abandon the country they have partially subdued, and come within the limits of civilization. [Laughter.]

While I do not mean to disparage whatever honest and whatever true Christian zeal have been put forth in behalf of the Indians under this new sentimental and emotional policy of the Administration; while I might concede all sincerity to its advocates; I still believe that if there ever was a policy deserving of reprobation; if there ever was an Indian policy that was disgraceful, sickening, and disgusting to the ultimate degree, it is that policy we have been pursuing for the last few years. Why, sir, ask any settler in that country; ask any man who has come in contact with the Indian as he is, who has not borrowed all his notions and theories about Indian character from the novels of J. Fenimore Cooper and the reports of the peace commission, [laughter;] ask General Sherman; ask General Sheridan; ask any man whose opinions are worth anything, and he will tell you that the Indian laughs at and despises your so-called Christian peace policy; that he regards you as suing for his mercy and forbearance; that he regards you as willing to buy or beg his good will and good behavior. Sir, the only sensible Indian policy (and of this I propose to speak more at length when the Indian appropriation bill shall be before us for consideration) is a policy administered by a powerful, firm, and just hand, under the exclusive control of the War Department of the Government. Under such a policy there might be less sentiment, less gushing sentimentalism, and fewer Christian converts; but, assuredly, less peculation and more honest dealing. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I wish to ask my friend from Nevada [Mr. KENDALL] whether any of these Indians have been christianized by the missionaries sent out by the Government to these Territories?

Mr. KENDALL. If there have been I have not heard of it, nor have I heard that such a thing is even seriously claimed.

We have all heard of these pretended missionary operations carried on in Arizona and in my own State. Some of these enterprises are under the auspices of that respectable sect, the Baptists—singularly enough, it would seem, since my friend from Arizona [Mr. MCCORMICK] knows, and my friend from Missouri who asks me this question also knows, if he has ever been there, that on our arid plains, often for hundreds of miles, there is not water enough to decently baptize a single proselyte. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KENDALL. Certainly.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I understand the gentleman to say (I think I must have misunderstood him) that there was not water enough in that whole country to baptize one Indian. If that is a fact, the country there must be very scant of water. I think that my friend probably intended to say there was not water enough there to wash away the sins of one Indian. [Laughter.]

Mr. KENDALL. I accept most cheerfully the amendment of my distinguished friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE.] I think it is a very proper one.

Now, Mr. Chairman, without trespassing further upon the patience of the committee, I will say in all seriousness, that I hope any legislation looking to a reduction of our military force in the western country will be most sternly voted down. I conclude, as I began, by entering my most earnest and solemn protest against any reduction of the military force now employed for the protection of our thinly scattered, struggling pioneers, who are leading ever onward and forward real Christian civilization, and culture, and well-ordered society over all that wide region, from the frontiers of Texas to Montana and sloping toward the Pacific Sea.

Mr. MCCORMICK. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. As the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. KENDALL] has five minutes remaining, the Chair will consider that the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MCCORMICK] is speaking in the remainder of his time.

Mr. MCCORMICK. I had not intended in this connection to submit any remarks on the proposed reduction of the Army, but to confine my words on that subject to the debate that will necessarily arise upon the Indian appropriation bill. I have, during a number of years past, taken part in the debate upon that bill; and gentlemen who have served with me in this House will testify to the fact that I have always insisted that a great part of our difficulty with the Indians has arisen because of our inadequate military force. Gentlemen protest here from year to year against increasing the expenditures in the Indian Department; but we never should have been called upon for such increased expenditures or had an accumulation of ills such as we have upon the frontier, if the Army had been kept at a proper strength or placed so as to furnish anything like adequate protection to the people, and to meet properly the advances of hostile Indians. The trouble has been that for years our Army on the frontier has been compelled generally to confine itself to mere defensive movements; and such movements are of scarcely any value in Indian warfare.

Mr. COBURN. Does the gentleman characterize the conduct of General Crook as being in that style?

Mr. MCCORMICK. No, sir; I do not characterize General Crook's conduct as being in that style; but I undertake to say that what General Crook has done should have been done years ago.

Mr. COBURN. Does not the gentleman consider that what General Crook has done has been done well?

Mr. MCCORMICK. What has been done by General Crook has been well done, as I have said repeatedly on this floor; but although General Crook has succeeded in putting many of the wild Apaches upon reservations throughout Arizona and New Mexico, it is believed that those wild Apaches will not stay there unless he is allowed to retain all the force he has at this time. No longer ago than last evening the Commissioner of Indian Affairs told me that the presence of the troops to watch the Indians upon the reservations was a part of the President's so-called peace policy.

Now, sir, a word about the statements of General Sherman lately made before the Military Committee. Those who know General Sherman know he has a prejudice against the great southwestern region which came to us under the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo and under the Gadsden treaty; that he is one of those gentlemen who are content to say, without careful and thorough examination of the land to any extent, that it is totally worthless. I say, after ten years of familiarity with that tract, after ten years of examination of its various resources, I believe it is one of the richest mineral districts belonging to the General Government, a country well worth protecting, and which to-day would be returning millions of dollars to the Treasury of the United States if it had had adequate protection for its mines and settlers, so they could prosecute their industries without constant interruption on the part of hostile savages. The governor of the Territory of Arizona, a practical miner, asserts that if adequate protection had been given to those engaged in mining the Territory to-day would yield a revenue of $20,000,000 a year from its gold and silver mines.

The country is not worthless. It is destitute of water in some sections, but the grasses are abundant and nutritious; and in Arizona we have one river, with five steamboats running on it at the present time—I speak of the great Colorado River—the line between Arizona and California. Gentlemen are too apt to take it for granted that these remote Territories are utterly barren, and it is too much the custom to underrate their population and capabilities, as is the practice with my friend General Sherman. Eastern people are too apt to think the stories as to their desolate characteristics are true. I now, Mr. Chairman, pronounce most of these stories false, utterly and completely false; and I know that gentlemen who have familiarized themselves with the frontier will agree with me.

The Territories have had no proper representation of the facts regarding their resources presented here. There has been no opportunity. While we have a book here of two hundred and four pages of testimony taken by the Military Committee, there has been no hearing given to any representative of the Territories; no chance to make a single explanation concerning the resources of the Territories, the wants of the settlers there, or the adequacy or inadequacy of the military force there.

In the name of nearly four hundred thousand men who live upon the frontier, I protest against the acceptance year after year of statements from those who are not qualified to speak on subjects relating to the frontier, and against the absolute indifference to the men who come from there and who have a right to speak. They may be few in number as compared with the population throughout the length and breadth of the United States, but they are American citizens, worthy of your confidence, worthy of your sympathy, worthy of your support. They are men who are entitled to as much of protection as though they lived in the city of New York, or the city of Boston, or the city of Philadelphia. It is no argument to say they are few in numbers and have gone far out upon the frontier; no argument at all.

It is, I think, a most humiliating thing to admit, on the floor of the House of Representatives, that the American people—forty millions of people—are not sufficiently strong and have no sufficient means to protect the men who go upon their own frontiers. It remains for our Government to be the only government in the world to admit openly in the halls of legislation that it has not force enough, it has not strength enough, it has not money enough, to protect its own citizens wherever they choose to carry its own flag upon its own soil.

I hope hereafter more opportunity will be given to those who represent frontier districts to speak on these and other questions, to be heard before committees. I have great respect for these committees, but I think, in reference to matters appertaining to the frontier, they should give every opportunity to those who represent frontiermen to be heard.

Frontiermen in Congress never undertake for a single moment to make suggestions in reference to the interests of the Eastern States, or the Middle States, or the Southern States. No man from the frontier ever attempts to say what should be done in Boston, or what should be done in New York, or what should be done in Cincinnati, or what should be done in New Orleans.

We ask but little, in the way of appropriations, in proportion to what goes to older States and districts. You have a vast number of appropriations here, in which we never share. Your appropriations for improvements of harbors and rivers, your appropriations for fortifications and public buildings, we have nothing to do with. In all appropriations of that class we never share. But in appropriations that affect the Army, the Indian service, and the survey of the public lands, I contend that the gentlemen who come from the frontier should have at least the same hearing before committees that is granted to those representing other sections of the country. Indeed, it would be no more than right to let them be heard first, and especially so in whatever relates to the Army, as the frontier is now the only seat of war, and the protection of life and property there the chief military service required.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Before the gentleman takes his seat I wish to ask whether the protection given to pioneers in Arizona is given by the Army or the peace commissioners sent there by the Government?

Mr. McCORMICK. It is given by the Army. And another reason why we must protest against the reduction of the regular Army is, that every time we have appealed to Congress to authorize our raising a force of our own, which would be the cheapest and best, we think, we have been refused——

Mr. MOREY. I find, among other items of appropriations in this bill, one for pay of the Army, for allowances to officers when traveling on duty, &c., the sum of $11,450,000. In looking hastily over the evidence before the Committee on Military Affairs, to ascertain in what places and in what items and what branches of the service a reduction of expenditures can be made, I do not find much hope that we can reduce the rank and file of the Army at all. But I think I can point out one small leak, where perhaps a saving can be made.

I find that in 1866, by some strange device, this remarkable provision was put into a law:

That officers of the regular Army, entitled to be retired on account of disability occasioned by wounds received in battle, may be retired on the full rank of a command held by them, whether in the regular or volunteer service, at the time such wounds were received.

This applies to officers of the regular Army. Now, sir, what is the practical operation of this bill? It is this: Officers holding the rank only of captain in the regular Army, held—perhaps only for a few days, as in some cases, in others for a few months, or possibly for a year or two—very high rank in the volunteer service; some of them the rank of brigadier-generals and major-generals. They were retired; the lieutenants, captains, majors, or lieutenant-colonels under the operation of the law, upon the retired pay of brigadier and major generals. In some cases officers leaving the Army, holding the rank of captain, receiving about $2,500 a year, were retired upon the retiring allowance, which I think is two-thirds of the pay, of a major-general—the full pay being $9,472 a year.

I hold in my hand the last Army Register. There are on this list about seventy of these officers, holding ranks varying from the grade of lieutenant to the grade of major-general; and among these officers there are many known not only to myself but to other members on this floor, who have no disability whatever that is at all apparent to themselves, their friends, or the community at large. Some of them are practicing law in New York; others are traveling over Europe. If they have any disability, it has not been discovered by their friends. Some two or three of them whom I could instance are doing more labor, more mental labor, in the practice of their profession of the law in New York, than the majority of the members on this floor give to their legislative duties and their professional duties together.

A MEMBER. Name.

Mr. MOREY. I would rather not name publicly. I might not object to do so privately.

I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact, that while the officers in the volunteer service, who went through the war and shared its perils and its risks equally with those of the regular service, and received nothing but a pension for the actual grade which they held and in which they served—the highest amount, I believe, being thirty-five dollars per month, or $420 a year—these officers, many of whom never held a higher rank in the regular Army than the rank of captain, are receiving as high as two-thirds of $9,400 a year.

Now, while the eyes of the country are upon us, so to speak; while the country is clamoring for economy, for the reduction in expenses; and while the members of the House are equally anxious in the same direction, I wish to call the attention of the House, and particularly that of members who are serving on the Committee on Military Affairs, to this unjust—because in its practical operation it is unjust—provision of the law, which makes such a broad distinction between officers of the regular Army and officers of the volunteers.

I will now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.]

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I wish to make a few not very well-digested observations upon the proposition of the committee to reduce the force of enlisted men in the Army. They propose to reduce it from thirty thousand to twenty-five thousand men, as I understand. I wish to say in advance that I am not opposed to economy in this matter. I am not opposed necessarily to a reduction of the aggregate force. I wish it to be done, however, in accordance with some well-considered system; I wish it to be done as any wise manufacturer or business man, of whatever class, would reduce his own scale of operations. For example, in the running of a large manufacturing establishment, should we expect the directors or superintendents, if a bar or wheel or rod gave out in a machine, to neglect to renew that wheel, rod, or bar because they could save something by doing it? Should we expect the superintendent or manager to discharge a large force of working operatives while he continued to purchase the usual supply of raw material, and continued to employ the usual number of men in the counting-room, and the usual number of foremen to attend to the usual number of machines? Now, to reduce the operative men of the Army, while you leave the whole grand machine in its full proportions, is just as unwise, exactly. The manufacturer would begin to reduce his purchases of raw material; he would reduce the number of men in the counting-room; he would find that he could discharge some foremen, and instead of suffering machines to fall into disorder and break up, he would stop arbitrarily the running of some machines and sell them. If any analogous reduction can be made in the Army, well and good; but you cannot dash into the middle of a machine and take out a portion of it, and say you will no longer supply that portion with whatever is necessary to the running of the machine. We have already greatly damaged the Army by this ill-considered, irregular method of reduction. We have stopped promotions in certain corps of the Army. If you do not want an officer higher than a colonel on a certain staff, there is an easy way of providing for reducing the system; but do not stop promotion where it stands. Do not let there be no further promotions, for in that way you inflict great injury on the Army, and secure no real benefit to the revenue.

Now, it was well enough to say that there should not be more than three major-generals in the Army, and to provide that as vacancies occurred they should not be filled. We have reduced the number in this manner from six to three.

But look at the course you have pursued with regard to the medical staff. You have stopped promotion and forbidden appointments there, and to what condition have you brought that staff? I might stop here to show you the importance of a well-regulated staff, and a medical staff especially. I could stop to show you that the medical staff occupies a different position to-day from what it did fifty years ago. There was a time when a surgeon in the Army was looked on very much as a horse-doctor was. But a medical officer in the service now receives equal social honors and professional credit with his brethren outside of the service. You have stopped promotions and appointments, until the evil has become so great that there has come to the rescue of the medical staff of the Army the American Medical Association. Four hundred and fifty delegates from all parts of the country, representing that learned and useful profession, met at Saint Louis and adopted the resolutions which I will read:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this association, the rank of the medical officers of the Army ought to be fully equal to that of the officers of any other staff corps or of the medical corps of the Navy; that we learn with regret that this is not the case; and that we regard with grave disapproval the odious discrimination thus made against a meritorious body of officers.

Resolved, That we look upon the law which prohibits promotions and appointments in the medical corps of the Army as unwise and unjust, and that, in our opinion, it ought forthwith to be repealed.

I wish to put that upon record as the expression of opinion of this great, learned, and useful body of men. They affirm that you are doing gross injustice to the medical staff.

I hold here in my hand also the respectful representation of a large number of the older and abler surgeons in the Army to the President, representing the discreditable situation in which they find themselves. I quote from it three paragraphs:

The inducements to engaging in private practice are the prospect of increased income and reputation with advancing years. In the Army these are represented by rank, not only because increased rank carries with it an increase of emolument, but also because to the Army officer rank is well and properly understood to enhance the dignity of the person holding it, as well as the respect in which he is held by his compeers and subordinates.

The rank of medical officers should therefore be no less than that of the other staff corps; they require an equal education and equal abilities, they perform equally arduous duty, they sustain as great responsibilities, they are exposed to like dangers, and in the distribution of the rewards of the military career they should be entitled to an equal share. * * * * * * *

A further injustice has been done not only to the medical staff, but to the profession at large, by the legislation which at present forbids any promotions or new appointments in the Medical Department; to the former, because, from the rapid depletion which ordinary casualties make in its ranks, it throws increased labor upon those who remain, and necessitates the employment of physicians under contract, who, having but a temporary tenure of office, cannot be expected to be actuated by that single regard for the service which is a sine qua non to the faithful performance of duty; to the profession at large, for it prevents many who are desirous of entering the military service from doing so, and thus perhaps compels them to abandon a design to the accomplishment of which their education may have been especially directed. There are now sixty-one vacancies in the medical staff, fifty-three of them being in the grade of assistant surgeon. Should promotion be restored, it would then take at least two years to fill the vacancies now existing.

We can have no more physicians and surgeons than you authorize by law, and the result is that the Department is compelled to employ them temporarily. There is no inducement for young men of talent and ambition to enter the medical corps, for you have cut off promotion.

So, too, under a false pretense of economy, you have reduced the number of paymasters until the number is now below that requisite to pay the Army as it ought to be paid; for every man who has ever been in the Army knows, that if you are to have contented and faithful troops, you must keep your bargain with them and pay them at the end of every two months, as you promised.

You have forbidden promotion and appointments in the Ordnance Corps. I do not stop to argue that, though I should like to do it if I could have time for thepurpose; but I hold in my hand a list, which I asked an ordnance officer to give me, showing the number of the arsenals and the posts of duty occupied by every officer in the Ordnance Department. And I venture to say that these men many people look upon, as I fear many of you here look upon them, as doing nothing to earn their salaries. Sir, there are no officers under this Government anywhere who serve more faithfully or are paid less generously than these ordnance officers. There is not an idle man among them.

You have nineteen arsenals. I say you can reduce them to four or five. That is one of the reductions which I would advocate. You have nineteen arsenals, besides your headquarters ordnance office, and all your officers are busy from morning till night. I will illustrate by referring to a particular case of which I have some knowledge. In Springfield, Massachusetts, near where I live, is Captain or Major Benton; I am not sure what his exact position upon the staff is. He is called Colonel Benton, and is in charge of that great manufacturing establishment, at a very moderate salary. Just below him, at Hartford, is General Franklin, who, if he had remained in the Ordnance Corps, would, I think, have been of the same rank as Major Benton. Yet General Franklin is receiving, in civil life, more than twice as much money as Colonel Benton, the faithful and veteran servant of the Government, is receiving. Yet I suppose there are persons who may happen to see Colonel Benton, with his shoulder-straps on, who will say, "See; there goes one of your idlers, living upon the fat of the land and doing nothing." I could go through all these officers, and in the case of each one show a similar condition of affairs. They are all well qualified and busy men.

Now, if you want to become economical, if you want to reduce properly, then begin at the head of the Army, and not at the foot, as General Sherman said before your Military Committee. He said, "You had better set me adrift, and tear out the first thirty pages of your Army Register, than to begin at the bottom of the Army." Begin with the salary of General Sherman, and cut it down to $10,000 or $12,000 if necessary.

Mr. WHEELER. Does not the gentleman know perfectly well that it is not within the province of the Committee on Appropriations to do any such thing?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I understand that very well. The Committee on Appropriations now begs for mercy, and says that it cannot go into this thing. Then it should have done nothing at all, instead of striking at the center of the machine and making the whole of it useless, by the mere pretense of economy. If the Committee on Appropriations wants to get at this matter properly, then let it bring in a well-matured and carefully prepared resolution looking to this end, and urge it upon the consideration of the House, and it can and will instruct its Committee on Military Affairs to prepare the necessary provisions of law for the purpose. Then you would have a symmetrical, well-balanced and well-considered reduction. But you should not go into my factory, for instance, and tell me to discharge a hundred of my workmen, and then expect me to continue to run the factory and make it profitable.

I wish now to call attention to some remarks made by General Sheridan upon this subject. It is in the testimony of General Sherman, given since the printing of the testimony laid upon our tables this morning. I am very sorry that this House could not have heard his testimony before the Committee on Military Affairs, when, with the map of this whole great country before him, he took his pencil and designated the position of every regiment and every company. And yet gentlemen wonder what we want with so many soldiers out there.

As has been well said here to-day, in 1860 our frontier was a line running from Saint Paul straight on down through the Indian Territory to the Gulf, with a few scattered posts in California. Now your Indian frontier is really ten times what it was in 1860. You have regiment after regiment distributed through that country—a company here, a company there, and a company there. And when General Sherman was asked what a particular company at a certain place had to do, he said that there was a pass through the mountains there through which the Indians made their raids once in a while; that a little time ago they raided on a settlement there. He gives a strategic reason for each company, and goes over the whole western territory, until it is all covered with the lines of his pencil. He shows how these companies are necessary to protect your railroads, your emigrants, and others you have invited to go into the country.

Now, can you reduce these companies? Yes; you can provide that the companies shall not be filled up to replace their natural depletion; that a company away out in Wind River Valley shall be reduced to twenty men; that another company shall be reduced to thirty men. But some one will say, you should equalize your companies. Yes; but that involves transportation for several hundred miles. In short, you would throw your whole force, from the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean, into confusion.

I beg you, if you insist upon reduction, to direct your Military Committee to bring in a bill, beginning with the generals of your Army and going down, so that we may have the machine reduced from a cannon down to a pistol; and not take a musket and take out the mainspring, hammer, and ramrod, and then ask us to use it. Let us, at least, keep a pistol, so that we can have something to fight with.

I want to read a few words from the testimony of General Sheridan. When asked how he would make a reduction in the Army, he said:

I do not know that I can fairly answer that question. My knowledge is almost entirely about my own command. I do not know anything about the fortifications, or the amount of appropriations that is asked for them, or anything of the kind. I therefore do not know what can be done in that respect. But I do know that you cannot reduce the force in my command unless you cease protection to some of the best interests of the country.

I read further from the same examination:

Mr. GUNCKEL. If compelled to reduce the number of either, would you reduce the number of privates or officers in the line of the Army?

General SHERIDAN. I think they should go together. If you reduce the number of men, of course you would have to reduce the number of officers. But the fact of the case is that you gentlemen cannot imagine the utter demoralization that has been created in the Army by the constant legislation in Congress affecting the Army. Almost all of you have commanded troops, and know what a panic is. The Army is kept in a condition of constant panic all the time, until I have become very much discouraged about it. In the matter of economy, I can say that there is not a single demand for money coming from any part of my division that I do not supervise myself. I have been all over the division, and know everything about it; and no officer can ask for a cent of money without my knowing whether he should get it or not. We are as economical as we can possibly be.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Is it not a fact that a good many companies now in your command are but skeleton companies?

General SHERIDAN. They are skeletons. They are so small that they really become non-effective, so that when we have anything to do one company is scarcely enough to do it.

The trouble about all that is this: that the Government is all the time breaking its contract with its people. It engaged with me twenty years ago for my service for my whole life; and if it turns me out it breaks its contract with me. It is not the intention of the Government to deal unjustly with individuals; and we ought not to abandon a system because it costs something to carry it on. Sometimes we happen to be caught in a panic and a pinch, but if we can bridge it over for a little while things will be all right again. It will be a violation of the contract, on the part of the Government, to deprive men of the profession to which they have given their lives. Suppose I was turned out of the Army, what would I do? I would have to die as soon as I could; and I am better prepared for being turned out—prepared for it physically and otherwise—than most of the officers whom I know. With this constant legislation by Congress we do not know what to do. We get demoralized. We are kept in a condition of panic; and you know what it is to manage men who are panic-stricken. If you do not, I do.

* * * * * * *

The CHAIRMAN. But as there are eighty-three officers going out every year, that number would cover the officers of several regiments.

General SHERIDAN. That would be a shrinkage.

The CHAIRMAN. Could it not be done in that way?

General SHERIDAN. If it is to be done that would be the best way to do it. The Government then does not violate its contract with the officers. There was an instance of that two or three years ago, when it was concluded to have only three major-generals. There were six major-generals then, but there was to be no promotion until the number came within the limit. Since that time the limit has been reached by the deaths of Major-General Meade, Major-General Thomas, and Major-General Halleck.

So that if we want to reduce the force of officers we should pass laws providing that as officers retire or die their places shall not be filled.

General Sheridan further testifies, in regard to the demands made upon him for troops, that since he came here to this city, in obedience to the summons of the Military Committee, he has received a request from the Interior Department to protect a certain location out in that country, but has not troops with which to do it.

I might go further; but I see my time is about out.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let the reading of the bill now be proceeded with by sections.

Mr. SPEER. I want to inquire of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] whether I understood him correctly upon one point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] is recognized.

Mr. SPEER. I want to inquire of the gentleman from Connecticut whether I understood him correctly as reading from the testimony of General Sheridan that that officer said he would have to die unless the Government supported him; that he was unable to maintain himself in civil life?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. If the gentleman wants me to go into an exposition of the abilities of General Sheridan, I can do so; but I supposed the gentleman had heard of him before.

Mr. SPEER. I hope the gentleman will answer my question.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The statement I read from the testimony of General Sheridan was made in his characteristic off-hand way, and was that if he were now turned out of the Army he would have to die as soon as he could. The gentleman may take the statement for what it is worth. I presume General Sheridan could earn his own living anywhere; and if he could not there are some people who would be quite willing and glad to help him. General Sheridan made that remark as an illustration of what would be the situation of officers who have served thirty, forty, or fifty years if they were turned out; that they would have difficulty in earning an honorable living, as their whole training has been with reference to military life.

Mr. NIBLACK. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Oregon, [Mr. NESMITH.]

Mr. NESMITH. Mr. Chairman, if I were to consult my own convenience I would not trespass upon the time of the House; but I feel that my duty to my constituency requires me to enter my protest against any proposed reduction of the military forces now employed for the protection of the frontier.

Our frontier has expanded and been extended a hundred fold since I crossed it, thirty-five years ago; then its practical extent was from Fort Leavenworth on the North to Texas on the South. Since that day we have acquired Texas, Arizona, New Mexico, California, Alaska, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Montana, Colorado, and the other great interior Territories have been settled up and require protection.

Now the great "hue and cry" that has been gotten up here for the reduction of the Army has emanated from those who are interested in maintaining what is known as the "peace policy" in relation to the conduct of our Indian affairs. They tell us that we want no military force to protect the frontiersmen; that "Jesus Christ and Him crucified" is the means by which the Indians should be pacified. Why, Mr. Chairman, if John the Baptist had gone there "preaching in the wilderness," he would not have kept the hair on his head for twenty-four hours.

The missionaries sent out by the Government have rendered no protection, but, on the contrary, they have robbed and plundered the Treasury. All the protection we ever get on the frontier is derived from the presence of troops. I can take you through my State for more than two hundred miles where you will never be out of sight of the grave of a white settler, butchered by ruthless savages before we had protection. I believe the transactions in the lava-beds will demonstrate to every gentleman upon this floor—and if they do not now they will when the appropriation bill comes up to pay for them—that there is no peace on that border. The troops there were held in abeyance by these peace commissioners, who were sent out with the understanding they should negotiate peace with these hostile Indians with arms in their hands—as brave and as gallant troops as ever shouldered a musket or drew a sword—kept in abeyance for three months, while supplies were being sent in to feed Indians who had murdered our women and our children on the frontier.

These stump orators of the Lord, [laughter,] these broken-down gospel peddlers, [renewed laughter,] who are selected for the purpose of going out to investigate Indian affairs, come back with the report that the Army demoralizes the Indians, and that the frontiersmen are worse than the Army. I repudiate it, sir, as a frontiersman; and I say that as a class they are as honest, as law-abiding, as intelligent, and as virtuous as any class of people in this country, notwithstanding what the gentleman from New York said yesterday about contracting the frontier and bringing those people in as you would contract the currency; bringing those people into the civilized portion of the country where they would not need protection. It was well said by my friend from Nevada, [Mr. KENDALL,] that the same system would confine civilization east of the Alleghanies. Why, sir, if this policy is to be pursued, and our country is not to be permitted to extend because of the appropriation of money required to be made by Congress for the protection of our frontiers, why not extend it to the civilized portion of the country as well as to our western frontiers, whence you derive all of your metallic currency to-day? Why not extend it to New York? More money is asked in the way of appropriation for the defense of the city of New York to-day than for the defense of the entire frontier. I would ask the gentleman from New York, why not move that city up above the highlands of the Hudson; stretch across the river the old chain they had in the days of the Revolution, and abandon the place which to-day requires such large appropriations for its defense?

Mr. Chairman, those people who desire to break down the Army and deprive us of any frontier defense are the men who are disbursing to-day $10,000,000, under the pretense of benefiting the Indians Under their organization they have five inspectors. They pick up some old broken-down politician, or some dilapidated stump orator of the Lord in the East who never saw an Indian, [laughter,] and give him $3,000 a year and pay his expenses to go out upon the frontier to inspect Indian affairs. [Laughter.] What sort of an inspection is it? The inspector goes there under the direction of the agent, who belongs to his own society, and he has an interpreter. I questioned some of those gentlemen on that subject. They do not know a single word of the Indian language, never having been, perhaps, beyond the city of New York or the city of Philadelphia before. All their impressions, all their knowledge, are obtained through the Indian agent, who is holding his office by the sufferance of the inspectors, and the interpreter who communicates between him and the Indians is also dependent on them for his official position. Of course the result is, that the frontiersmen are denounced, and the Indians are praised as legitimate and proper subjects to be embraced within the folds of the Church. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. NESMITH. Certainly.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Oregon whether the same missionaries are not more rapid in going to the paymaster's table than in going to the Lord's table? [Laughter.]

Mr. NESMITH. I have seen them at the paymaster's table, but never at the Lord's table. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBURN. Did you ever go there yourself?

Mr. NESMITH. I have been at both places. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBURN. To stay?

Mr. NESMITH. Now I wish to illustrate this question by showing the information these gentlemen obtain from the Indians. The Indians are assembled by order of the agent, and communications are made through a dependent interpreter. These Indians tell a good story. I have heard them tell it over and over again. They tell this commissioner, this inspector, that this agent is a very good man, that he is doing what is right about them. They say he is honest.

Those old humbugs sit around and tell these stories, and the Indians go home with a sack of flour under one arm and a blanket under the other, as a reward for testifying for this peace commission. We had an illustration of it last year in my own State, in a case I referred to at the commencement of my remarks. There the Indians were permitted to abandon their reservation and go into a country occupied by the white settlers, the land having been surveyed and occupied by pre-emption settlers; and if I had time I have abundance of testimony in my desk which I could submit to the House, which would establish this. But I have not time to go into that, and gentlemen will observe that I am speaking in rather a hurried manner on this subject, and without due preparation. I shall probably take occasion, again, during this session, when the Indian appropriation bill comes up, to refer to this subject a little more at length.

But, without attempting to delineate what the general characteristics of the Indians are, I will say that of all the commissioners we have sent among them, Miles Standish was the first and ablest; after him came Anthony Wayne, who settled the troubles in his time in the Northwest; after that, Jackson, in the South; Harney, at Ash Hollow; and we have had Sheridan, Crooke, and a great many commissioners of that kind, who have afforded us great protection and done a great deal to civilize those gentlemen who are constantly murdering, plundering, and committing depredations on the frontier. In this view of the subject I protest against any reduction, not of the Army merely, but of the appropriation for its support. We frontiersmen know what their ulility is and what benefit we derive from them. Without them our frontiers would be desolated; our people would be driven from their homes; women and children would be ruthlessly murdered—and these your own citizens, your own kith and kin, people of your own blood. You may by a parsimonious contraction of your appropriations, save a few millions of dollars; but every dollar you withhold from so necessary a purpose will be responded to by the blood of the frontiersman and the wail of the widow and the orphan.

Mr. NIBLACK. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CROOKE.]

Mr. CROOKE. This subject has been discussed from so many points of view that what I have to say which has not been said previously will take me but a very few minutes. I rise mainly to say a few words on the subject of economy. The word "economy" has been used and misused in this House.

From the 1st of December this House is said to have had an unusual number, relatively, of new members. We came here but little acquainted with the forms of the House, and of course we had to follow in the wake of old members who knew the rules of proceeding and the manner of getting their views before the House. All that is gradually passing away, and now, as the school-boys say, that we are getting a little the hang of the school-house, the new members will have their bashfulness wear off gradually and be able to express their own views with less reference to those who led the debates in the beginning of the session.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the Government of the United States owes some duties to the collective people of the United States, irrespective of party and irrespective of economy. It has been said here again and again that the country is paralyzed, that the prosperity of its people is paralyzed, and that it is necessary for something to be done.

The state paralyzed! Are we a live people, or must we go and do something to become so? Now if, as has been said, taxes are the blister of the body-politic, my constituents are a live people—not paralyzed; and they will hold that a blister is better than a paralysis, and that it will be better for the Government of the United States to discharge the functions of protection to the whole country than to stay paralyzed and talk paralysis the whole time.

The member who preceded me occupied most of his time in telling up of the misdeeds of the Congresses and the administrations which had preceded us. That has but little bearing on what is now before the House. We are acting for the future, or ought to act for the future. The misdeeds of the past, if there were misdeeds, are of no consequence, have no bearing upon the future of this people. The people require to be protected.

The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. NESMITH] spoke of the gentleman from New York who has reported this bill from the Committee on Appropriations. That gentleman advocates economy according to his views, and I believe he is as conscientious a member as there is in this House. He comes from the extreme north of the State of New York, and I represent the extreme southern portion, and perhaps our views may be as extreme—we living three or four hundred miles apart—as our relative whereabouts are.

One member has used the expression "sectional jealousy" as if the northern portion of the United States unnecessarily had jealousy toward the West and the South. The State of New York can afford to cherish no jealousy to anybody or to anything appertaining to the United States. The State of New York is large enough to dispense with jealousy at any time anywhere. That is the position of the State of New York. She is willing to be taxed, she is willing to be blistered, to protect our western brethren, from Alaska to the southern point of California.

I speak for my constituents. I speak for the people whom I represent, and nobody else on this floor has a right to speak for them; and when the apostles of economy on this floor would almost dispense with the ordinary functions of government on behalf of the United States, they do not speak for my people, and I repudiate the enunciation. The people I represent ask to be protected in their rights; ask to be protected on our southern frontier from incursions of pirates and enemies; ask to be protected by fortifications and heavy ordnance. The people on the western frontier ask to be protected by cavalry; ask to be protected by serviceable police, because our Army is nothing more in time of peace. We join hands with them from New York Bay to Oregon. There is no jealousy, no difference of opinion. We ask protection; it is the right of the people to claim, and it is the duty of the Government to give it. And when Congress interferes between the people and the executive and the administrative functions of this Government, the people will tell Congress to abdicate, rather than be without a government and without protection.

These are the views of the people I represent; and allow me to say one word in addition. Economy is well, retrenchment is well; parsimony is ridiculous in the Government. No government can stand parsimony; no government can stand meanness. The only question between me and any of my friends in this House is as to what is parsimony and what is economy. That is the only difference. I hold that it is parsimony and not economy to leave our West unprotected. It has been said here, and it has been said outside, that the Army of the United States is larger now than it was at the close of the war. The answer has been given here on the spot by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY.] Our frontier is six times as large. That is the answer to the whole story.

I see in reading over the items of the bill presented, the item of metallic ammunition, and there is hardly enough provided for to supply the Army for one week. Sir, retrenchment of that sort is not economy; nor is it retrenchment or economy to dispense with the requisite ordnance for the Army, and with the heavy guns needed for our fortifications; retrenchment of that kind is not economy. These are things that can only be got up in time, and cannot be got at a moment's notice. Anything of this sort is not economy.

Mr. NIBLACK. In what little I have to say in regard to the pending bill, I desire to have the ear of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and every member of that committee so far as possible. I appreciate as fully as any one can do the difficulties by which that committee is surrounded during the present Congress. I do not for a moment doubt the desire on the part of the committee, and every member of it, to retrench the expenses of the Government so far as possible; and in all matters of mere discretion, where the law does not settle the amount which is to be provided, I have every reason to believe that they will exercise that discretion in favor of a rigid economy. But what I desire to call attention particularly to, the attention not only of the committee but of the House and the country, is the fact that the mere withholding appropriations in most of the cases in which the committee is called upon to report money for disbursements by the different Departments of the Government is not either retrenchment or economy. And hence if we rely upon the Committee on Appropriations to retrench the expenses of this Government alone, we will for the most part fail of our purpose, and at the close of the present Congress be called upon to respond to demands for deficiencies, which will not only equal in the aggregate the amount of the expenditures appropriated for during the last fiscal year, but will be perhaps the usual advance upon them.

Why do I make this declaration? Because the largest portion, indeed almost the entire portion of the amount of money to be appropriated under the lead of the Committee on Appropriations is a matter fixed by law. We have already passed the naval appropriation bill, on which I submitted a few remarks, but for want of time did not say all I desired to say on the general subject of appropriations. But in regard to the naval appropriation bill, the committee did not appropriate the amounts estimated for by the Secretary of the Navy. We did not appropriate by about one and a half million dollars as much as he insists is absolutely necessary to carry on the Navy Department under existing laws. Of course I voted for the bill, but I did so with the most distinct, implicit impression, accompanied by a prediction which I believe I made at the time, that next winter, if the naval appropriation bill should pass the Senate without any restoration of the amounts estimated for, we will be called on to appropriate a deficiency. Let me illustrate this. Suppose we decline to appropriate the full amount to which the President of the United States is entitled by law; that would not reduce his salary. He could go into the Court of Claims, and by the action of that court obtain judgment against the United States for the amount of salary which we had withheld from him.

This deficiency can be obviated, of course, by the House passing bills for the reduction of the Army, and thus getting rid of expenditures which, under existing laws, must be and of course will be made. But what I am complaining of is that the mere withholding of money by the Committee on Appropriations, without some corresponding law reducing the expenses of that branch of the public service by the amount thus withheld, is not economy. Why do I say that? During the Fortieth Congress, in the summer of 1868, when public attention was beginning, for the first time after the close of the war, to be attracted to the expenses of the Government, and to the necessity for some reduction by which the country could be placed upon a peace basis, and some reduction of the Army take place if possible, the estimates submitted to the House for the next ensuing fiscal year were, for the Army proper, $51,039,134. Under the laws as they then existed, according to the number of men then belonging to the Army, on duty in different portions of the country, many of them being then engaged in carrying out the reconstruction measures of Congress in the States of the South; also upon the frontier, and wherever they were needed, as now, or at least wherever the public exigencies seemed to require them, this amount of money was estimated for as being necessary for the pay and subsistence of these men, and for the general operations of the Army according to the then existing law.

We had that year, however, what we have not this year, and I am very glad of it for many reasons, a presidential election on hand; and, as I have already intimated, it was thought necessary then by men of all parties that we should make at least a show of economy. I have not the precise figures here; but the result was that, instead of appropriating a little over $51,000,000, according to the estimate, we appropriated a little over $28,000,000; and in the canvass of 1868 the expenses of the Government for the succeeding fiscal year were computed upon that basis—that the Army was going to cost only a little over $28,000,000.

Having then already had some experience on the Committee on Appropriations, I sought the floor on that occasion and made some predictions in regard to the result of our reduced appropriations. I gave it as my opinion that it must inevitably result in a very large deficiency for the next fiscal year. I am very much tempted to have read at the Clerk's desk some remarks made by me on that occasion, but I suppose they are a little stale now. ["Have them read."] I will ask the Clerk to read what I send him from the Congressional Globe.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. NIBLACK. I want to call the attention also of the country to the fact that, in my judgment, the appropriations as they stand in this bill are insufficient for the purpose of carrying our Army establishment through the coming fiscal year; and that we shall be met hereafter by a demand to pass a vast deficiency bill to make up the deficit, created merely to make a show of economy just now. Therefore, though we may flatter the country with the idea that we are cutting down appropriations, and that the Government is going to be carried on very much more cheaply during the coming year than in times past, yet this idea will prove to be an illusory one, as the facts will hereafter demonstrate. I submit that so long as we keep our Army to its present standard, so long as we continue to maintain an immense standing Army in time of peace, so long as we support at a vast outlay a Freedmen's Bureau, and so many other unnecessary and expensive systems and offices, we cannot economize by simply failing to appropriate money in advance to meet the expenses of them. We shall be obliged to appropriate it hereafter. These expenses and salaries are always, sooner or later, paid; and we shall not accomplish any economy in the end by simply withholding appropriations now.

Mr. NIBLACK. I was then interrupted by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDREDGE,] who made some predictions, and charged that this apparent economy was practiced for political effect during the pending campaign. But, Mr. Chairman, I shall not have that read because it is not germane to the question now before the committee. In response, however, to what the gentleman from Wisconsin said, the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE,] the present Speaker of this House, having charge of the bill, proceeded to make a brief reply, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think we can afford time now for any political discussion on this bill. The Committee on Appropriations have done their best to furnish the facts on which they have based their action. They cannot furnish confidence or credulity to my friend from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK.] He may go on doubting and distrusting to the end. But we on this side of the House are determined to cut down the expenditures of the Government, and we have succeeded measurably, though not, I fear, with the good will or active co-operation of gentlemen on the other side. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. NIBLACK. I hope the gentleman will allow me a moment?

Mr. BLAINE. For a question, certainly.

Mr. NIBLACK. I only wished to place upon the record my prediction, we will next year have to meet a great deficiency bill.

Mr. BLAINE. The gentleman is one of the wise ones who want the advantage of saying "I told you so." I move that the committee now rise for the purpose of closing the debate.

Mr. NIBLACK. I now ask the Clerk to read the amount of the deficiency which we appropriated the winter following for the fiscal year which the bill then under consideration was intended to cover. This will show how well the prediction then made was verified.

The Clerk read as follows:

War Department.— For regular supplies of the Quartermaster's Department, $2,500,000; for incidental expenses of the Quartermaster's Department, $500,000; for horses for cavalry and artillery, $1,500,000; for transportation of officers' baggage, $100,000; for transportation of the Army and its supplies, $7,000,000; for barracks and quarters, $1,000,000; for Medical and Hospital Department, $50,000; for contingencies of the Army, $475,000; for Medical and Hospital Department, $750,000; for secret-service fund, $100,000.

Mr. NIBLACK. Now the actual amount of deficiencies which we were called upon to appropriate, as embraced in the items just read, was $13,975,000—nearly $14,000,000—about one-half as much as had been appropriated in the regular Army bill the year before. I have no idea that any deficiency so grave as that is likely to occur this year; but the point to which I desire to call attention is, that, however vigilant the Committee on Appropriations may be, and by however large a sum we may reduce at any one time the amount appropriated for the support of any branch of the public service, it is, in the end, no economy so long as existing laws authorizing these large expenditures are allowed to remain in force. This is true as a general rule, though there may be now and then a case where the Committee on Appropriations, or this House, by withholding an appropriation, may repeal an existing law to that extent. If it be the purpose of Congress to curtail the expenses of the Government for the next fiscal year, there is but one method by which it can be effectively done, and that is by having the different committees charged respectively with the several subjects for which we are called upon to appropriate go to work and bring about the repeal of existing laws under which extravagant appropriations are now authorized.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I would like to put to the gentleman a question. I understand him to say that the only way to economize is to change the law under which these establishments now exist?

Mr. NIBLACK. As a rule that is the only method.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Then must not the gentleman concede that under the law these establishments are conducted as economically as they can be? Is not that a fair inference from the gentleman's position?

Mr. NIBLACK. As a rule I am not prepared to charge otherwise.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. I am glad to have the gentleman's admission put on record.

Mr. NIBLACK. I could give instances during a few years past of expenditures which I think were not authorized by law, and which I think were larger than they ought to have been. I might criticise in that way many matters of detail; but that is not the purpose of my argument. The heads of Departments are entitled to the support of every one so long as we are not able to show that they are undeserving of public favor. They are responsible as heads of Departments, and the point I intend to make before I take my seat is this—I am glad the gentleman called my attention to it: Without the active co-operation of the heads of these different Departments—by which the Committee on Appropriations are given to understand, and other committees having charge of the subject are given to understand, certain laws may be repealed or certain expenses curtailed—it is no use to attempt to economize by simply withholding appropriations; for sooner or later, my experience is, these Departments get whatever they claim. Hence this matter of retrenchment depends more on the Departments of the Government—upon the Executive Departments of the Government—than upon Congress, because they are in possession of all the details.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Let me make a suggestion to the gentleman from Indiana. Has it ever occurred to him, if that is the case with the heads of these Departments, and they go on spending what they can get, that this line of argument is an encouragement to them to go on and expend more money than Congress appropriates, in the belief that it will be met by a deficiency bill? His line of argument, then, cripples Congress in attempting to limit these Departments in appropriations.

Mr. NIBLACK. My object in calling attention to the responsibility of these gentlemen, who stand at the head of the Executive Departments, for the expenditures of the money of the Government, is not to invite them to increase their expenses, but to try to get the country to understand they almost alone, in many respects, are responsible for many of the expenses which do occur, where those expenses are largely of a discretionary character, appertaining to their several Departments. But where it is a matter of law, where they have no discretion whatever, then the responsibility falls upon Congress, and Congress ought to make the attempt to correct the errors of the past; and it ought, in reference to many of these departmental expenditures, to call upon the head of the Department to communicate in what way a repeal or modification can be made of the law, so as, while economizing in these expenditures, not to cripple or impair the public service.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Does not the gentleman know, in any appropriation where Congress fixes the measure of the appropriation, and member after member gets up and predicts there will be a deficiency, that then there is more likelihood to be such a deficiency, because of the prediction and statement, than there would if members acquiesced in the limitation and sought to hold the Departments in their expenditures exactly to the measure of the appropriations passed by Congress?

Mr. NIBLACK. I suppose no member connected with the present administration of the Government will be unsophisticated enough to take anything I may say as marking the policy on the part of Congress.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. The gentleman is influential here, and what he says has great weight.

Mr. NIBLACK. I am obliged to the gentleman for his compliment. I think his experience on the Committee on Appropriations must have already indicated to him that when the law requires a certain thing to be done, every executive officer of the Government feels himself compelled to do that thing, and the responsibility for paying for that service rests upon Congress; and if we do not pay for it all at one time, we do pay for it in the end. I have no confidence in any proposition of retrenchment which does not at the same time have the concurrence of the officers of the Department to which the appropriation refers. I think, sir, every gentleman who has had much experience on the Committee on Appropriations, or on any other committee, must have long since come to that same conclusion.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the reason why I call attention to this matter is because the Committee on Ways and Means are charged with the duty of providing means necessary to carry on the Government. If we have not the money in the Treasury to do it, we have to provide for the deficiency either by increased taxation or a further loan.

If we can get along through the next fiscal year by simply withholding appropriations, cutting down below what they were last year, below the estimates, without increasing the burdens of the people in any way, either by taxation or a further loan, I for one shall be much gratified to be able to do so; but we ought not, in the present crisis in our monetary affairs, to deceive ourselves or to make a wrong impression upon the country. I hold it is the duty of the present Congress to do one of two things: either to repeal existing laws, as I have intimated, so as to reduce the volume of the expenditures, or else at once provide an additional loan, by which the money necessary to meet our present appropriation bills shall be provided. I do not claim any superior wisdom about this at all. It is the result simply of several years' close observation since I have had the honor of being a member of this House.

I will repeat what I have said, in substance, about the Committee on Appropriations. They seem anxious to do their part. They seem anxious to cut down appropriations wherever they can. I sympathize warmly with the chairman of that committee in his efforts to call back gentlemen to their duty in this respect. But, sir, I want to repeat in his hearing that that point is a vain one, unless he can have the co-operation of every leading committee of this House in these measures of economy and reform; and to attempt to cut down simply to withhold is not what the crisis demands.

Mr. GARFIELD. I appreciate the kindness of the gentleman, but I wish he would now add some words of advice as to what the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and the Committee on Appropriations itself, can do to bring about the desired result.

Mr. NIBLACK. If I were a member of the Committee on Appropriations, but without some of the responsible relations which the gentleman holds to the Administration and the country, I should recommend the appropriation simply of the amount of money that the revised estimates call for, and leave to the Administration the responsibility of making the estimates higher or lower, as they saw proper. Of course, if in looking over these estimates I found a particular item which ought to be stricken out, I would strike that out.

Mr. GARFIELD. Suppose five thousand enlisted men of the Army were one of the items, what would you say to that?

Mr. NIBLACK. If they could be dispensed with I would do it; but I would leave the responsibility in the first place on the Administration which makes the recommendation, and then upon the co-ordinate committee of the House in carrying into effect such a recommendation. I appreciate the gentleman's desire for reduction, and shall go with the gentleman in making the amount as large as he desires; but I want to go about it in a way that will mislead nobody; in a way that I shall not be misled myself; in a way that the House shall not be misled.

And I make this further suggestion as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, that in the present condition of affairs this Congress has to do one of two things, unless there shall be a great revival of the business, the trade, and commerce of the country: it has either to increase taxes or to borrow money. But we have resolved here to do neither; neither to increase taxes nor to borrow money. I appreciate fully how very unpleasant and ungracious a thing it is to attempt to raise additional sums of money for carrying on the Government. But for one I desire to say here in my place, that, ungracious as it is, I shall co-operate in the endeavor to furnish the means to carry on the Government economically and efficiently.

I shall not attempt to occupy the attention of the House any longer. I trust I shall not be considered as having attempted to lecture anybody. But having had some experience as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and having now some responsibility as a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, which is charged with the responsibility of providing the money for these appropriations, I desire to put my opinions on record, and I shall endeavor to be governed by those opinions as far as I shall be called upon to take action in this House.

Mr. WHEELER and Mr. RANDALL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] who has charge of the bill, is recognized.

Mr. WHEELER. What does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire?

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to address a few words to the committee.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman give way for a motion that the committee rise with the understanding that to-morrow morning, before the House goes into committee, I will move that all general debate shall be closed in half an hour, one-half of which shall be given to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. RANDALL. I am willing to agree to that arrangement, although I do not know that I shall occupy as much as fifteen minutes.

I should like just here, however, to say a word. As one of the minority on this side of the House, I wish to say that I mean to vote not one dollar of appropriation which it is shown to me is not necessary to carry on the Government in its absolutely legitimate purposes. And I believe, further, that if we do that we shall meet the expectations of the country in that particular. I believe that either a temporary loan, or an increase of taxation in any direction, is entirely unnecessary if we bring ourselves down to a strict and legitimate economy. And when I hear gentlemen prating about economy, and failing to vote for it on every occasion, I am led to doubt the sincerity of their motives or the independence of their action.

Now, sir, we are just in the position in which a man is in a period when he must economize—just as I have been myself since the reduction of salaries. [Laughter.] I tell you, sir, we have been spending more money than has come into our Treasury, and we must now economize and spend under our receipts, so as to reach a level with the past extravagance. When we have reached that point, then we can commence anew.

As to the Army, I agree that it is most essential that the border people of this country, who have displayed more spirit than those who remain in the East at home, receiving all the culture of civilization, should be protected in their lives, their homes, and their wives and families. But, sir, the fault is not in the number of the Army; the fault is in the assignment of the Army. I say, take your Army from the South; take your Army from Louisiana, and put it to its legitimate purposes—for the defense of the lives of our citizens, and not for the crushing of the liberties of our people.

Mr. BECK. I desire to say something before the gentleman yields the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the gentleman proceed.

Mr. BECK. I do not want to speak at much length, but I wish to say a few words now in connection with what my friend from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] has said. I differ with him absolutely as to its being either right or proper for this Congress to appropriate what the heads of Departments ask us to appropriate, without thorough investigation into all the facts upon which the recommendations are based; when we do, we come short of our duty, and throw off the responsibility which is properly imposed upon us.

Mr. NIBLACK. I did not exactly say that much. I simply desire to place myself right, by stating that I said that in the absence of any information of my own, I took such information as was furnished me by the heads of Departments; but where I had information in regard to particular items I would be governed by my own judgment, and reduce the amount if I could. But the point I was insisting on was that, in regard to this matter of information, we are in the very nature of things almost entirely dependent on the Executive Departments. And furthermore, that however much we may struggle to investigate matters ourselves, we are sooner or later brought back to the information they furnish us, and have to be governed by it. I do not, in saying this, say that I would take their judgment where I had means of forming an opinion of my own; but where we cannot form opinions of our own, then it is necessary that we shall take what we can obtain from the Departments.

Mr. BECK. Now, Mr. Chairman, I admit that where this House has no opportunity for obtaining information, as in the extraordinary appropriation bill for the Navy, and a responsible officer of the Government tells us that such an amount is absolutely necessary, and we have no means of knowing whether it is true or not, it is hardly fair for us to deny the truth of what he says. But this House has absolute power and authority, in ordinary times and upon all ordinary subjects, to obtain information upon all matters. Everything that is accessible to the head of any Department is equally accessible to the committees of this House.

Mr. NIBLACK. Have the committees time to obtain that information?

Mr. BECK. Some of them, perhaps, have not time to do all that is imposed on them, nor all that they propose to assume. But there are committees enough in this House, if those committees will work faithfully, to obtain all the information that need be obtained upon all subjects. They can demand it from all the Departments. We have committees now charged with the duty of inquiring into the expenditures of the Treasury Department, into the expenditures of the War Department, into the expenditures of the Navy Department, into the expenditures of the Interior Department, into the expenditures of the Post-Office Department, and into the expenditures of the Department of Justice; and I do not believe, sir, that one of those committees, although two months of the session have gone by, have yet met, or taken any steps to obtain the needed information. If one of them has, let some gentleman tell me which one.

Mr. SPEER. The Committee on the Expenditures of the Department of Justice was only provided for recently, and has not had time to meet yet; they will meet before long.

Mr. BECK. Have any others met?

Mr. TODD. The Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department have held a meeting and adopted a plan for investigation.

Mr. BECK. Has any other? No, sir. Two months of the session have gone by, and the committees of this House, in the face of charges made that the contingent funds of the several Departments have been misappropriated, up to this time have not ascertained the facts, and most of them have not held a single meeting. We need these facts now to act intelligently on appropriation bills.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman if he thinks it quite right to scold the committees of this House? [Laughter.]

Mr. BECK. It is not—as you illustrated yesterday. But I say that this House has time and opportunity to obtain all necessary information. If its committees do their duty, we are not dependent upon heads of Departments for information.

Mr. NIBLACK. If anything I have said, or that the gentleman may be able to say, will put these other committees to work in this matter, then I shall have accomplished much more than I hoped to do. But what I was endeavoring to do in the discursive remarks which I made was to say that the other committees must go to work, and I am glad to know that the gentleman from Kentucky concurs with me in that view.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman from Kentucky allow me to put an interrogatory?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. I have listened for several days to the effort of the gentleman from Kentucky to suggest to this House how it ought to conduct its business. May I suggest to him that he has no reason and no occasion to get up in the House here and assume that any committee of the House has not discharged its duties? I suggest that each committee of the House is supposed to be conversant with its own duties and responsibilities, and is cognizant of them. I should myself be unwilling to get up and say that any committee of the House had not been discharging its duty, because I am not certain that they would not turn on me, and ask me if I am sure that I am discharging my own duties.

I suggest to my friend that this continual repetition of the charge that this committee and that committee of this House is not discharging its duty is assuming such a supervision over the committees that I would not myself want to assume.

Mr. BECK. I want to say, in reply to that, that I never alluded to this subject before, except yesterday evening in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] My friend from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] suggested that the committees had no time for their investigations. Now I insist that they ought to take time, and that there are committees enough in this House to get at the bottom of every evil that anybody has complained of. That is all I desire to say. We all know this to be true, that the contingent expenses of all the Departments of the Government ought to be ascertained, and accurate statements made in regard to them. We have, as is well known, committees enough for that purpose, and they have sufficient time to enable them to obtain and furnish that information.

Mr. DAWES. Has my friend any evidence that any one of these committees is neglecting that very duty?

Mr. BECK. I will answer in this wise: it is so important that we should know these things that I have gone to the minority members of these committees, and they have told me that the committees have never been called together. I have urged them to impress upon their chairman the necessity for calling them together.

Mr. DAWES. I would suggest to the gentleman that he should not put his reliance solely upon——

Mr. BECK. That is my information.

Mr. DAWES. Perhaps if the gentleman were to inquire of the chairman of the committee he might ascertain some reason why they have not met.

Mr. BECK. The minority members of the committee ought to know.

Mr. DAWES. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman too much, but I suggest to him that he assumes that members of the House are not discharging their duties.

Mr. BECK. I accept the intimation of the gentleman. I had no intention of making a reflection on members. I want the information they can obtain; the House needs it while appropriation bills for the various Departments are pending before it.

Mr. RICE. I desire to know of the Chair what is the subject-matter before this committee now?

Mr. BECK. I want to go on with another subject.

Mr. NIBLACK. Allow me a moment. Does not the gentleman concur with me that it is impossible for any committee of this House to sift all the expenditures of any Department carefully and successfully without the active co-operation and aid of the head of that Department, and the heads of the Bureaus in that Department?

Mr. BECK. It is very difficult to do so. What I contend for is this: Believing that this House has the time, believing that its committees are sufficient for the purpose, believing that if we go to work with a will we can probe all the evils complained of without relying upon the heads of Departments—believing this, I insist that it is the duty of Congress to deal with each subject-matter, influenced, if you please, by such recommendation as may come from the heads of Departments, but not to be concluded, or to pass laws, unless the information they themselves obtained verifies and sustains the recommendations. This Congress is responsible to the country for all bad legislation and all the extravagance that may take place.

I have no doubt that the Army can be reduced to the point indicated by the Committee on Appropriations, and even below it, and still be sufficient to protect the lives and property of all the people on the western frontier, provided the Army is used for that purpose. But if the Army is kept all along the eastern sea-board, all through the Middle States, all through the States of the South, not for the purpose of protection, when millions of dollars are squandered in that way, it is no argument to me to say that we have not enough men on the frontier now. Why are they not put there? They are not needed anywhere else. There can be ample protection afforded to the frontier even if twenty thousand is made the maximum of the Army.

A great deal has been said about the Indian troubles. We are compelled to expend, as the Secretary of the Treasury has shown in his Book of Estimates this year, $8,500,000 for the Indians, in addition to all the sums expended on the Army. It is claimed that treaties have been made which require this large annual expenditure, and that in addition to all that we are now proposing by this bill to take from the tax-payers of this country. We have to pay $8,500,000 additional for the support of Indians—a sum more than double what ought to be required, or what was ever given until within the last four or five years. All this, be it remembered, is independent of the millions given to the Army to keep the Indians in peace. Sir, it seems to me that Congress can regulate these things, no matter what Departments may say.

Take another thing. In the Treasury Department $3,000,000 are now used by the Secretary of the Treasury under what is known as the loan fund or per cent. fund. Bureaus and chiefs of staff are organized all through that Department, where hundreds of thousands are spent. Men are traveling all over Europe who are allowed mileage, compensation, and expenses. All sorts of means are resorted to to get clear of this $3,000,000. And there is not a man in this Congress to-day who can tell how it is spent; no account whatever is given of it. Have we not the right to put that matter in shape, to lop it off? Because the Secretary of the Treasury wants to keep up this personal and traveling staff, and retain all these scores of men, for which he has no warrant of law, and because he has $3,000,000 of money which he can spend at his discretion, are we to say that we shall not look into it, and lop it off if we deem it right to do so? I contend that it is not only our right but our bounden duty to look into this and other like matters; and it is our right to withhold appropriations which are not in accordance with law, and to repeal laws that are improper, no matter who protests.

I want to state further that to-day we have one hundred and ten ports of entry and twenty-four ports of delivery. At many of these ports which are utterly useless there are collectors or appraisers at a fixed salary of $3,000 a year; we allow to these places weighers, gaugers, and all sorts of useless but expensive machinery of that kind. Are we to keep them up because a Secretary wants them? By comparing the Finance Report of 1873, page 449, with the last Book of Estimates, page 267, you find some curious results at these ports of entry, taking the State of Maine alone, simply as an example, it being the first on the list and no worse than the others, perhaps not so bad on the whole. At Aroostook, Maine, $13,000 are collected, while $13,167 are paid out for expenses; at Passamaquoddy, $92,000 are collected, and $27,000 paid out; at Castine, Maine, $36 are collected, and $5,900 paid out; at Waldoborough, $7,000 are collected, and $7,000 are paid out; at Bath, $7,300 are collected, and $7,700 paid out. So it is nearly all the way through, in the Southern as well as in the Northern States. Indeed only eighty-four of the one hundred and ten make any returns at all, but the expenses go on all the same; the whole system is rotten to the core.

Mr. TODD. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir.

Mr. TODD. Would the gentleman abandon all ports of entry at which the amount received for customs is less than the expense of maintaining the port of entry?

Mr. BECK. I tell you what I would do. Out of one hundred and ten ports of entry, as I said, only eighty-four return anything; nearly one-half show larger expenses than the moneys received. I would cut off all the superfluous employés, or consolidate four or five of them into one.

Mr. TODD. I wish to suggest, in connection with my question, that along the coast line, where there would otherwise be abundant facilities for smuggling, these ports are established for its prevention.

Mr. BECK. At nearly every one of these ports there is a collector, at $3,000, or $2,500, or $2,000; and there is besides a list of from five to fifteen other officers; while it is a fact that in many cases three or four of these collection districts could be consolidated without any damage to the public interest, or that an assistant collector of internal revenue could make all the reports and exercise all the supervision necessary.

For the collection of our customs revenues we are now paying $8,500,000 in one form or other; and at three-fourths of these ports an officer engaged at the salary of a few hundred dollars annually could do the work as well as or better than it is now done with all this expensive machinery.

Mr. TODD. Has not this system existed for sixty years or more, under all administrations of the Government?

Mr. BECK. This system has existed from time immemorial; but the expense of it has increased from $3,000,000 in 1860 to $8,500,000 at the present time. When we see these swarms of office-holders increasing is it not our duty (even though the Secretary of the Treasury asks us to keep them all up) to investigate the facts, and if we find that one man can do the work of three, are we to be bound by his recommendation? Ought we not to cut down these expenses wherever the facts may warrant it, and by all means within our power?

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. BECK. As many as the gentleman pleases.

Mr. CONGER. With all the ports of delivery on the Mississippi and its tributaries, there are no receipts for customs there except at New Orleans. Now, would the gentleman abolish all those ports of delivery?

Mr. BECK. I would not abolish any port that may be necessary to guard against smuggling or to collect any amount of duties, however small. I would put no limitation upon commerce. But I would do away with the needless hordes of officials that are now drawing from five to twenty thousand dollars at each of these ports, when in fact one man can do all the work. I would not keep up at these ports of entry a swarm of officers as part of a system of machinery to control elections or for any other purpose.

Mr. CONGER. I would like the gentleman to answer my question.

Mr. BECK. I will.

Mr. CONGER. Not one of the ports on the Mississippi and its tributaries above New Orleans pays into the Treasury one dollar of revenue; and according to the gentleman's rule there should be no port of delivery on those rivers except at New Orleans. Yet the gentleman and his friends would, I have no doubt, complain bitterly if those ports of delivery were discontinued, although they do not pay one cent into the Treasury and are kept up at great expense to the Government. Why would not the gentleman apply to the Mississippi and its tributaries the same rule he would apply to the coast of Maine?

Mr. BECK. I would apply the rule to the Mississippi River, to the coast of Michigan, or wherever elsewhere extravagance and corruption may prevail, no matter in what part of the country it is.

Now, let me show how these things are managed. I hold in my hand a paper published in New Hampshire; I believe it is a democratic paper; but I will read you an extract from a republican paper embraced in the same article. It shows, for example, how our navy-yards are managed when an election is about to take place, and may be taken as a specimen brick, which is the way in which I want the House to look at the ports in Maine to which I have referred. This paper goes on to say:

> It is known that the politicians who went to Washington in December succeeded in having a large sum set apart specifically "to be applied to the additional force to be employed from New Hampshire" in January, February, and March. In round numbers, the pay-roll for these three months will amount to $300,000.
> And while this crowd of men are kept in the navy-yard at this station, and this immense sum is drawn from the United States Treasury to pay them, hundreds have been discharged from Brooklyn and Charlestown because there was no work, and because the money recently appropriated by Congress for the navy-yards had been expended.

Mr. TODD. What paper is the gentleman reading from?

Mr. BECK. From the Portsmouth, New Hampshire, Evening Gazette, a democratic paper.

Mr. RANDALL. But the extract which is referred to is from a republican paper.

Mr. BECK. Yes, sir. It then goes on to say:

> It is a matter which interests every tax-payer, and we intend to keep the ball rolling. The Portland Advertiser (a republican paper) in a recent issue, in speaking of affairs at this naval station, says:
> "It is a notorious fact that at the navy-yard a swarm of hangers-on are maintained, whose sole duties are political. The are paid to keep our Senators and members of Congress in place. One of these people said the other day, 'If the management of the yard were left to me, I could save $50,000 a year for the Government, and do all that is done now; and I would begin the list of removals with myself. I ought to resign now; but if I did, some other do-nothing would draw the pay.' It is perfectly understood that, in addition to the list of permanent sinecures, a special fund is always used to carry the elections in Maine and New Hampshire."
> An admission from one of the hangers-on, published in a republican paper, that $50,000 a year might be saved by the abolition of useless permanent sinecures; $100,000 might be saved during this campaign, if the yard was not used as a political machine to make votes for McCutchins, and as much work would be done as will be done previous to our State election.

If these facts are true, as stated by that paper, and it is said to be republican, ought we to be controlled by the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy as to the system prevailing at the navy-yards? Ought we not to look into it to see whether these facts are true, and if they are, ought they not to be corrected?

Now I will yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. E. H. ROBERTS,] who I see wishes to ask me a question.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether the Committee on Ways and Means, of which he is a distinguished and active member, is not now busy in reference to the very matter about which he is complaining, to wit, the reduction of the expenses of collecting the customs, and particularly in reference to the class of customs officers to which he has referred?

Mr. BECK. The Committee on Ways and Means is actively employed on these things, and my friend from New York is one of the most active members of the committee in that regard; but if we are to be met on this floor with statements that we must do what the Secretary wants, I intend to show that we ought not, and I wish to prepare, as far as I can, the minds of members of the House to be ready to act when the gentleman from New York makes his report, and I hope he will make it strong, to sustain his recommendations. Notwithstanding the Secretary may contend that the Department cannot do without them, this House ought to insist promptly and in strong language, not to be misunderstood, that all these abuses shall be corrected. It will be false to the country if it does not.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. But will not the gentleman from Kentucky confess that the statement, that "we must do what the Secretary wants," comes from his side of the House, and not from ours?

Mr. BECK. The statement, as I first understood it from the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK,] was what caused my remarks; but he has since explained it to the satisfaction of the gentleman from New York as well as myself, and fully agrees with me. But no matter who makes it or what side it comes from, the sooner it is rectified the better. The truth is Congress has been doing what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] has charged and made good, and that is, we have been yielding to the orders of the Departments who create these deficiencies, as they call them. Whenever we do not give them what they ask, they spend the money out of the Treasury in spite of us, just as the Secretary of the Treasury drew $5,000,000 of the $6,000,000 in the first three months of the fiscal year, and then forced deficiencies upon us to be provided for, saying the service would be stopped if we did not give them to him. All the Departments do it, and tell Congress that it creates a deficiency by not giving all they ask, just as enormous buildings are begun, and money must be furnished to any amount demanded on that which has been expended last.

Mr. E. H. ROBERTS. I will ask the gentleman from Kentucky another question. Will he not admit that it will be more fair to discuss this question when it shall be legitimately before the committee and the House than to draw it in here just now by the tail?

Mr. BECK. It is legitimate to draw it in by the head or by the tail whenever an opportunity is afforded, and I intend to get it in whenever I can get the floor to call the attention of the House and country to it. I am making these statements in this disconnected way now because I may never have another opportunity. I obtained the floor by accident, expecting to say only a few words when I rose, but I have yet more to say.

I differ with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] still further. He thinks we will have to vote for increased taxes or an increased loan, and seems to believe that we cannot get along otherwise. I say here I will not vote for either increased interest-bearing loans or increased taxation, because I know we can so reduce the expenses of the Government as to keep them far within even the revenues now being received, if we keep expenses where they ought to be. The Secretary of the Treasury in his report shows that he had $131,000,000 in the Treasury on the 1st of July, sixty-odd millions of which can be used. One hundred and forty-two millions were paid to him from the 1st of July to the 1st of January, from customs and internal revenue, and he has $44,000,000 of greenbacks which he is using besides, while all his necessary expenditures were $152,000,000 during that time. Under the enormous appropriations for the current year we have been guilty of the folly—and I intend to show that it was done in violation of law—of attempting to pay large amounts of the principal of the public debt; we have squandered $40,000,000, given it to bondholders in palpable violation of law, in order to buy in $400,000,000 of our debt. I have the authority of a distinguished Senator belonging to and a leader in the party on the opposite side of the House for the statement that it has cost $40,000,000 to get in the $400,000,000. Sir, there is no sense, there is no propriety, in running syndicates at an expense, as was said by the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance in the Senate, the other day, of more than 2 per cent. under the pretense of trying to convert our bonds from 6 to 5 per cents, even when we pledge payment of principal and interest of the latter in gold, and exempt them from Federal taxation to boot.

Sir, when the interest on the public debt has been diminished $30,000,000—mark the statement; I have the authority of the chairman of the Committee on Finance of the Senate for it—when we have $30,000,000 less interest now to pay than we had to pay four years ago, when the average appropriations were about $280,000,000 annually, until we made them $323,000,000 last year; why, I ask, is it that with $30,000,000 less of interest the yearly expenses of the Government should exceed $250,000,000? And why should estimates be laid before us for $319,000,000? Sir, stop the Secretary of the Treasury from buying the principal of the public debt long before it is due, and taking from the tax-payers of the country money, worth to them 10 per cent., to pay to men holding obligations of the Government, bearing only 6 per cent. interest, and they not due. Stop the syndicates, lop off the excrescences, and $250,000,000 annually is all we need.

I expect to show by authority that the other side of the House will recognize that even your act of March 18, 1869, to strengthen the public credit, which I have declared upon this floor, and now repeat, was the greatest financial swindle ever perpetrated, and to repeal which I have a bill now pending before the Committee on Ways and Means—that even that act prohibited the squandering of the $40,000,000 that have been taken from the tax-payers and given to bondholders.

I will read the act:

That in order to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors, and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the laws by virtue of which such obligations have been contracted, it is hereby provided and declared that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver.

Now listen to this:

But none of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity, unless at such time United States notes shall be convertible into coin at the option of the holder, or unless at such time bonds of the United States bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed can be sold at par in coin. And the United States also solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky that the longest time claimed has long since expired.

Mr. WHEELER. I yielded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] in his own right.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania claims his whole hour, the Chair will recognize his right to it; but the Chair understood that he only asked for fifteen minutes, and that time has long since expired.

Mr. RANDALL. I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] to make a proposition that the committee rise, and that to-morrow we should close the debate in half an hour, each taking fifteen minutes; but subsequently he yielded to me in my own right, and after making a few remarks I yielded to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK,] and whatever time I had in my own right I transferred to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield what remained of his fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. BECK. I did not so understand it.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no doubt the Chair got the impression from the first proposition of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BECK. If the committee desires to rise now, I will limit myself to ten minutes to-morrow, to show, as I can conclusively, that these bonds have been paid in violation of the law of 1869.

Mr. RANDALL. I cannot permit the gentleman from Kentucky to make any proposition as to my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is speaking in the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. I will resume the floor.

Mr. BECK. If the committee will rise now I will be content with ten minutes to-morrow.

Mr. WHEELER. I would like to understand what are the views of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in regard to further time for debate. I supposed he had taken all the time he desired.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not desire to speak at length except to-morrow morning.

Mr. WHEELER. I did not so understand. I supposed he had taken all the time he desired this evening. I will now state my purpose, so that gentleman on the opposite side may not be taken by surprise.

Mr. RANDALL. We will not come in conflict.

Mr. WHEELER. I shall move now that the committee rise, and then I will move in the House that general debate on this bill be limited to one hour after the committee resumes its session.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not propose to yield the floor to allow the gentleman to make any such motion.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman has the floor in his own right, and has had it from the outset.

Mr. RANDALL. I know that, and I want to accommodate myself to you.

Mr. WHEELER. I wish the gentleman would indicate what he wants.

Mr. RANDALL. All I wish is to have the floor when we next go into committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have that, of course.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KELLOGG reported that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that all general debate on the Army appropriation bill be limited to one hour after the House shall again resume its consideration in Committee of the Whole; and that thereafter it shall be considered under the five-minute rule.

Mr. RANDALL. What will be the effect of that motion, if agreed to, upon my right to the floor in Committee of the Whole on this bill, for one hour, as conceded to me by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] and of which I had occupied but a portion when the committee rose?

Mr. WHEELER. I conceded to the gentleman ten minutes, which I understood was all he desired.

Mr. RANDALL. I took the floor in my own right, which, under the rules, gave me one hour.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] had the floor in Committee of the Whole, and yielded only to allow the committee to rise, the House cannot take from him his right to an hour, except by a suspension of the rules.

Mr. RANDALL. Of course, if two-thirds of the House are disposed to take from me my right to an hour, I must submit.

The SPEAKER. That can be done only by a suspension of the rules on Monday, after the morning hour.

Mr. WHEELER. Then I modify my motion, and move that all general debate be limited to one hour after the time expires to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is entitled.

The motion was agreed to.

MONUMENT TO THE MOTHER OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. SENER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the select committee formed by a resolution of this House to consider the practicability of finishing the Washington Monument by the approaching centennial be also further directed to inquire and report as to the practicability of completing the unfinished monument to the memory of Mary, the mother of Washington, at Fredericksburgh, Virginia.

Mr. POLAND. I move that the House now take a recess.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until seven and a half o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half-past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. G. F. HOAR in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

REVISION OF THE STATUTES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House meets this evening to resume the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the United States. It is entitled "A bill (H. R. No. 1215) to revise and consolidate the statutes of the United States in force on the 1st day of December, A. D. 1873." The Clerk will resume the reading of the bill.

Mr. POLAND. Before the Clerk resumes the reading of the bill, I desire to present the amendment to come in at the close of section 766, which I suggested last evening, but did not have here in the proper form.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

1. In the case of any person alleged to be restrained of his liberty in violation of the Constitution or of any law or treaty of the United States. 2. In the case of any prisoner, who, being a subject or citizen of a foreign state and domiciled therein, is committed, or confined, or in custody by or under the authority or law of the United States, or of any State, or process founded thereon for or on account of any act done or omitted under any alleged right, title, authority, privilege, protection, or exemption set up or claimed under the commission, order, or sanction of any foreign state or sovereignty, the validity and effect whereof depend upon the law of nations or under color thereof.

Mr. DURHAM. Is this a part of the original statute?

Mr. POLAND. It is. As I explained last night, these are the cases in which an appeal lies in habeas corpus cases.

Mr. DURHAM. This is the one to which you called our attention last night?

Mr. POLAND. It is the one I explained last night, but did not have present.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. I now yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. In the chapter relating to the Army I have some amendments to propose. The first is in the head-line on page 257, line 1183. That now reads "Paymaster's Department organization;" it should read "Department organization." That is no part of the law, but should be stated accurately.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will note the change indicated.

Mr. LAWRENCE. In the first section of this chapter, in the paragraph relating to brigadier-generals, I move to strike out the word "eight" and insert the word "six," so that it will read "six brigadier-generals." The act of July 15, 1870, (16 Statutes, 318, section 8,) provides "that no appointment to the grade of brigadier-general shall be made until the number of officers of that grade is reduced below six; after which the number of brigadier-generals shall not exceed six." As a matter of history there are but six brigadier-generals now, and so the law now only authorizes six.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I also move to amend on page 259, line 19, by changing "Paymaster's Department" to "Pay Department."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I also move to amend on page 258, by striking out the last proviso of the first section of this chapter, as follows:

And provided further, That no appointment to the grade of brigadier-general shall be made until the number of officers of that grade is reduced below six; and after which the number of brigadier-generals shall not exceed six.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I offer the following amendment:

On page 273, insert between sections 1227 and 1228 the following as a new section: SEC. —. The President is authorized to prescribe the uniform of the Army.

Mr. CONGER. Is that the present provision of law?

Mr. LAWRENCE. The section which I send to the desk is in words a little different—article 100 in the Articles of War, April 10, 1806, volume 2 United States Statutes, page 371. It is found in volume 1 page 310, of the printed volume of the commissioners' revision, but is omitted in the final report. This is not the exact language, but it is the idea as agreed upon by the Committee on Revision of the Laws. The provision, as far as I have been able to ascertain, has never been repealed.

Mr. WILLARD, of Michigan. I wish to inquire if the amendments the gentleman from Ohio proposes have all been acted upon by the Committee on Revision of the Laws.

Mr. POLAND. The amendment which the gentleman has just proposed was considered by the committee. It was stated to me, by Judge James, one of the revisers, that this original provision of the law that the President should prescribe the uniform of the Army had been repealed, and that the uniform was now prescribed by law. I would suggest that this amendment be passed over for the present.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Very well.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendment will be withdrawn. The Chair hears none.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I desire to offer an amendment on page 290, under the heading "Articles of War." My first amendment is to article 1.

Article 1 was as follows:

ARTICLE 1. Every officer now in the Army of the United States shall, within six months from the passing of this act, and every officer hereafter appointed shall, before he enters upon the duties of his office, subscribe these rules and articles.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out in line 1 the words "now in," and insert in place thereof the word "of;" and strike out all after the word "States" to the word "officer," inclusive; so it will read:

Every officer of the Army of the United States hereafter appointed shall, before he enters upon the duties of his office, subscribe these rules and articles.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to strike out article 58, on page 297, as follows:

ART. 58. Regimental officers serving in their regiments and having brevets, or commissions of prior date to those by which they are mustered in their regiments, may take place on courts-martial or on detachments, when such courts or detachments are composed of different corps, according to the rank given them in their brevets, or according to the dates of their former commissions; but they shall do duty and take rank in the regiment, troop, battery, or company to which they belong, both in courts-martial and on detachments which are composed only of their own corps, according to the commissions by which they are mustered in the said corps.

This article is the same as article 61 in the Articles of War of 1806, United States Statutes, volume 2, which was subsequently repealed.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. My next amendment is in section 1383, page 304.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1383. When the office of paymaster, passed assistant paymaster, or assistant paymaster becomes vacant, by death or otherwise, in ships at sea, or on foreign stations, or on the Pacific coast of the United States, the senior officer present may make an acting appointment of any fit person, who shall perform the duties thereof until another paymaster, passed assistant paymaster, or assistant paymaster shall report for duty, and shall be entitled to receive the pay of such grade while so acting.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I offer the following amendment:

In lines 1 and 2 strike out "passed assistant paymaster;" and strike out the same words in line 6.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. The same words, "passed assistant paymaster" occur in several subsequent sections. Should not the same amendment be made there as in section 1383? The expression occurs again in section 1385.

Mr. LAWRENCE. There it is right. It properly belongs there. But the amendment should be made in section 1389.

Section 1389 was as follows:

SEC. 1389. No paymaster, passed assistant paymaster, or assistant paymaster shall be allowed a clerk in a vessel having the complement of one hundred and seventy-five persons or less, excepting in supply steamers and store vessels.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to amend the section by striking out in line 1, the words "passed assistant paymaster."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. My next amendment is in section 1396.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1396. Cadet engineers who are graduated with credit in the scientific and mechanical class of the Naval Academy may, upon the recommendation of the academic board, be immediately warranted by the Secretary of the Navy as engineers.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I offer the following amendment:

In lines 3 and 4 of the section strike out the words "immediately warranted by the Secretary of the Navy as engineers," and insert "appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate as second assistant engineers."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The next amendment is in section 1397, page 306.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1397. The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may appoint chaplains in the Navy.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out in line 2 the words "chaplains in the Navy," and insert "for the public armed vessels of the United States in actual service, eighteen chaplains in the Navy."

Mr. E. R. HOAR. It occurs to me that my colleague should allow me to propose a slight change in the phraseology. Might not the effect of the section, passed in the language now given to it, be to authorize the President to make additional new appointments of so many chaplains besides the number already existing?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask the Clerk to read the section as it will be if amended as I propose.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 1397. The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may appoint, for the public armed vessels of the United States in actual service, eighteen chaplains in the Navy.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. My suggestion was, that instead of giving the President the power to appoint eighteen chaplains in the Navy, this might be construed as an additional appointment of that number. I would suggest that it should read in this way:

The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may appoint chaplains for the public armed vessels of the United States in actual service, and the number of chaplains shall not exceed eighteen.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I have no objection to that.

Mr. POLAND. It hardly occurs to me that the amendment, as presented by the gentleman from Ohio, is fairly open to the criticism of the gentleman from Massachusetts. If we were passing what professed to be a new law, it might well enough be construed that we were providing for eighteen more chaplains than the law now provides for. But when we put in this provision, professing that this is merely the state of the law on the 1st day of December, it seems to me that the difficulty does not arise which the gentleman from Massachusetts apprehends.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I will state that we considered in committee this morning the question whether there should be eighteen chaplains, or more; and the committee determined that eighteen, and only eighteen, were authorized by law. Since that time I have received a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, saying that, according to the construction of the Navy Department, there are twenty-four chaplains authorized. That, however, does not change my opinion about it; but I think it fair to state the matter to the House.

Perhaps I may as well state the exact position in which this matter stands. The act of April 21, 1806, Statutes at Large, volume 2, page 390, authorizes the President to appoint chaplains for the public armed vessels of the United States in actual service. The ninth section of the act of March 3, 1871, (16 Statutes at Large, page 536,) provides for not exceeding eighteen chaplains; it leaves the whole number possibly indefinite. The commissioners in their printed volumes say there are twenty-four chaplains authorized; but they do not refer to any statute which in terms fixes any such number.

The act of August 4, 1842, (5 Statutes at Large, page 800, section 1,) limits the number of officers to the number in service on the 1st of January, 1841. What that number was does not of course appear by any statute. But the construction which the committee put upon these laws is that the act of March 3, 1871, (chapter 117,) limits the number to eighteen. That I believe to be the true reading of the law.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, on a former occasion I urged, with what ability I could, the propriety of inserting in this revision the laws as they actually exist, even to the extent of referring, if necessary, to the last appropriation bill which may have declared the number of different officers to be paid. But I was met by the committee with the proposition that while the law provided for classes of officers the different appropriation bills changed them, and they only held office in accordance with the appropriations made by Congress, and that therefore it was unnecessary to specify any number. It is pleasant to me to perceive that the suggestions which I then made have been quietly working in the minds of the committee, and have even led my friend from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] to try to reduce my suggestions to practice.

Now, the number of chaplains in the Navy from the time when the act of 1793 was passed has varied, I venture to say, every ten years, if not every year. During the late war the number of chaplains could be counted by hundreds. There must have been some provision of law upon our statute-books later than the act of 1793, later than the act of 1841, later than the act of 1847, which authorized the appointment of chaplains by the score and the hundred during the late war; and there must have been some provision for their reduction. Where is the law for the increase, and where is the law for the reduction? It can only be found, I suppose, in the revision and reorganization of the Army and Navy, which I have no doubt does define accurately and carefully the number of chaplains that may exist in the Navy in a peace establishment.

Mr. POLAND. What is the number? That is what we want to know.

Mr. CONGER. I cannot say. It has not been my duty, and I am sorry to say it has not been my privilege, to follow up this examination. I am only talking to the same point as I did the other night—the existence of a law on this subject. Now, I do not know of any law that limits the number of these chaplains to eighteen; and I do not propose to accept the law of 1793 as the last law on this subject, when there have been since that time hundreds of chaplains in the Navy. The only interest I feel in being present here with my fellow-members during the examination of this revision is, first, in regard to some particular chapters which I have examined and in which I feel a special interest; and, next, that this committee shall report and the House shall pass upon the law as it is.

Now, I understand the fact to be that in the law reorganizing the Navy there was a provision for twenty-four chaplains. If we now incorporate into this revision a restriction to eighteen, somebody must go out; some old minister of God—I do not know who—must depart. [Laughter.] If we adopt this provision it becomes a law of the land; for I assume that the House is not going to review this matter again. The House will probably adopt the revision as agreed on in this thin House as the final action on the subject. I think, therefore, that our amendments should be made with full reference to the law as it is. I have insisted heretofore, and I now insist, that our amendments shall be so framed as not to change the law as it is, whether the law be found in a general act or in an appropriation bill. When I speak of "the law as it is" I mean, of course, the law as it was on the 1st of December last. In thus acting in a thin House upon this revision we may by inadvertence, by changing or omitting a few words, by embodying what we consider to be the substance of the law—we may change the organization of our Departments, or leave them without any law under which to act until Congress shall meet again, unless we chance to discover the error during the present session. In this way we may create great confusion. It is for that reason I desire to add to what is said on this subject the expression of my regret that the changes were made the other evening in striking out the number of clerks. And it is for that reason I desire to call the attention of the committee as to the propriety of striking out any number which is supposed to be the law.

Mr. POLAND. I am thankful for this lecture of my friend from Michigan. Several members of the committee have, over and over again, repeated that our efforts will be confined entirely to make this revision express just what the law is. My friend seems to have an idea we have a lurking purpose to change the law, when we have determined ourselves, and said so, here and everywhere, and to everybody, not only that we did not intend to do it ourselves, but did not intend to allow anybody else to do it if we could possibly help. So my friend may content himself from now forward; the committee do not intend to make or to allow, if they can help, the slightest change in the law. That we may sometimes mistake what the law is is very possible, and perhaps more than possible; but our work has to go through another House and before another committee, and there will be a fair opportunity for any mistakes which may be left in this work when we get through with it to be discovered and corrected.

We are going through this in a liberal, good-natured way, and with the understanding, agreed to all around by general consent, if anything is discovered which is wrong, we are to go back and correct it. That is all I desire to say.

As to this particular amendment, it is true the committee have agreed to it in the form presented by my friend from Ohio; but from an examination of the statute since we are satisfied the number we put in, eighteen, is not the true number. The number is fixed by law. It is not like the action my friend is talking about, of mere annual appropriation to pay a number of persons. Chaplains in our Navy are officers, who are so by law, as much as the Secretary of the Navy. The committee came to this conclusion on the recent statute which provides chaplains in the Navy shall take rank, &c., in three different ranks of chaplains in the Navy, and those, three in number, make eighteen, and we assumed that statute provided for all the chaplains there were in the Navy; but going back it does appear by statute twenty-four chaplains in the Navy were authorized, and the commissioners in their revision put in the number at twenty-four. The committee struck off the additional six. I think, taking both acts together, the number should be twenty-four instead of eighteen.

Mr. CONGER. I have but one word further to say to my venerable friend, the chairman of this committee. He is so remarkably thankful to me for small favors that I may venture to say he will receive greater ones in proportion; and if my simple objection to this, as it was about to pass unquestioned, has been able to call from the gentleman from Vermont an admission that the amendment proposed by the committee is wrong, and which he now seeks to correct, I have, in my feeble way, done some service. It was for that object I rose, and having accomplished that purpose I take my seat.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The commissioners in their revision, in their printed volume, referred to this matter of chaplains. I will give the text, and the note accompanying it, as well as the marginal reference:

Chaplains, number and appointment of.

"SEC. 36. The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may appoint not exceeding twenty-four chaplains in the Navy."

21 Apr., 1806, ch. 35, § 3, vol. 2, p. 390; 16 Apr., 1814, ch. 58, § 5, vol. 3, p. 125; 4 Aug., 1842, ch. 121, § 1, vol. 5, p. 500.

The act of 3d March, 1871, ch. 117, fixes the relative rank of chaplains as follows: "Four chaplains shall have the relative rank of captain, seven that of commander, and not more than seven that of lieutenant-commander or lieutenant."

This accounts for only eighteen. The question therefore arises whether Congress intended to limit the number of chaplains to eighteen, or intended that all over that number should be without relative rank. Meantime the number is left in this revision as fixed by previous acts. There is no such inconsistency as works a repeal.

I may remark that there is no previous act which fixes the number of chaplains. There is an act, the act of August 4, 1842, volume 5 of the Statutes at Large, page 500, section 1, which limits the number of officers to the number in the service on the 1st of January, 1841. What that number was I do not know, but the view I take of it, and the view which the committee took of it this morning is, that the act of 1871, which will be found on page 536 of volume 16 of the Statutes at Large, in section 9, did limit the number of chaplains to eighteen. I think that when Congress provided relative rank in these words, "four chaplains shall have the relative rank of captain; seven that of commander, and not more than seven that of lieutenant-commander or lieutenant," Congress had in mind this: that there should be four chaplains who should have the relative rank of captain, seven that of commander, and that the President might appoint as many more, not exceeding seven, making in all eighteen, if he deems it necessary, the latter seven of whom, if all were appointed, shall have the relative rank of lieutenant-commander or lieutenant; in other words, Congress contemplated the possibility that there would be no necessity for the whole eighteen, and therefore, in my judgment, they used the expression "and not more than seven" who should have this relative rank. They intended to have none without any relative rank. They did not intend to have a class which, according to naval etiquette, would be thus degraded. I think, therefore, that the true reading of all these statutes taken together is, that the number is limited to eighteen; but if the House should be of a different opinion, as the Navy Department seems to be, and I am not much surprised at it, we can correct the number accordingly, and, of course, I shall acquiesce in any decision that is made. It is a question of construction, and it is for the House to determine what is the true construction.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I desire to inquire what would be the effect of omitting the number altogether.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Well, Mr. Durant, in his revision, uses this language:

The President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may appoint chaplains in the Navy.

That is the construction he puts on these laws, and the effect would be that the President might appoint every preacher in the United States as a chaplain, if it were possible for him to abuse his discretion in that way.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. Do we repeal the laws already existing on the statute-book when we re-enact them in this?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Well, that is a question of construction. Where a statute is evidently designed as a revision of the whole subject, it repeals by implication all other statutes upon the same subject. That is a rule of law, a rule of construction. And we are to determine by construction what is the meaning of these laws all taken together.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the number, to wit, the word "eighteen."

Mr. POLAND. If the gentleman will yield to me, I will suggest that the amendment be perfected hereafter, and the number left blank for the present. The committee gave the same construction to this statute that the gentleman from Ohio does, and I did agree to this number. I put the same construction on it that is given in this amendment, but on further examination, it strikes me that a provision giving rank to eighteen is not so contradictory of the previous provisions of law, fixing the number at twenty-four, that we could say that if there were six more to whom no rank was given, they were dismissed.

Mr. LAWRENCE. There is no law which fixes the number at twenty-four.

Mr. POLAND. Let the amendment be adopted, leaving the number blank.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I want to arrive at what we are doing. I confess I have been somewhat in the dark. I suppose we are revising the laws, and if that is what we are doing, then certainly it occurs to me that the remarks of my colleague from Michigan [Mr. WILLARD] are very pertinent in reference to our action in the past in this revision. But I understand that by peculiar phraseology we are revising, consolidating, and virtually compiling the laws; then the question occurs to me, do we re-enact the laws? It seems to be a little strange that we should re-enact laws that are dead and no longer in force, and have no vitality on our statute-books. If in revising we are putting into the revision laws no longer on the statute-book, it seems to me an absurdity. And therefore I wish in offering this amendment to draw from the committee precisely what we are doing, and I insist on my amendment, in order that we may have a full explanation.

Mr. LAWRENCE. With the consent of the committee, I will withdraw my amendment and offer it in different language.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman from Michigan to insist on his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I will hear the amendment read, and then perhaps I may withdraw the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read Mr. LAWRENCE's amendment, as modified, as follows:

There shall be in the Navy, for the public armed vessels of the United States in actual service, not exceeding —— chaplains, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I will let the matter stand as it is for the present.

Mr. POLAND. I desire to say to my friend from Michigan [Mr. WILLIAMS] that we do not intend to revive any obsolete or repealed law. We intend to have this revision present the law just as it now is. But the statutes in relation to the number of chaplains in the Navy are in such a state that it is a matter of great doubt what the law actually is. That is what we are disagreeing about; not about what the law ought to be, but what the law is as to the number of chaplains. The statutes are somewhat contradictory upon that subject. This matter was considered in the committee only this morning, and the various members of the committee have not yet had time to make a thorough examination of all the statutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] has the right to withdraw his amendment without the consent of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] Rule 40 authorizes a motion to be withdrawn before it is actually amended by the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan. I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I ask that this amendment may be adopted, and at some subsequent time the blank can be filled.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move further to amend, on page 306, by striking out of section 1398 the word "chaplains" and inserting in lieu the words "a chaplain;" also, by striking out "their" and inserting "his;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 1398. A chaplain shall not be less than twenty-one nor more than thirty-five years of age at the time of his appointment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to amend section 1406 by striking out the words "and assistant naval constructors." Those words are not found in the act of March 3, 1845. The section will then read:

Naval constructors may be required to perform duty at any navy-yard or other station.

Mr. CONGER. Those officers exist, either by law or without law, and have rank in the Navy—"assistant naval constructors." Gentlemen will find, by turning to section 1477, on page 316, that their rank is defined: "Assistant naval constructors shall have the relative rank of lieutenant or master." They are therefore recognized by some provision of law; authority for their appointment must exist somewhere. In fact they do exist, to my own knowledge. There are assistant naval constructors, and they have a certain rank in the Navy, as naval officers all have.

Now it seems to me that, there being a section of the law recognizing this office of assistant naval constructor, and defining the rank of the officer, it is not proper to strike out the provision that authorizes them to be assigned to certain duty. Therefore I object to the amendment.

Mr. LAWRENCE. This section relates to the question of assignment to duty, not to the question of their existence at all.

Mr. CONGER. I happen to be familiar with the practice and orders in such cases, having among my acquaintance a gentleman occupying that position. I have seen his orders to go from one naval station to another, from New York to Pensacola. I do not know why an assistant naval constructor should not by law be required to perform duty at any navy-yard or station. These officers exist; they have their appointment, they have their rank; and they are the very officers that should be required to perform duty wherever directed. I cannot believe it possible that such an office does not exist by law.

Mr. POLAND. It does exist by law.

Mr. CONGER. If such an officer does exist by law, then I cannot conceive of his not being required to perform duty at such stations as may be directed.

Mr. POLAND. It is quite likely that the law ought to be as my friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] suggests. The difficulty is that it is not so. The act of 1845, from which this section is taken, provides that "naval constructors may be required to perform duty at any navy-yard or other station, and when so ordered shall be entitled to the same allowance for travel," &c.

Mr. CONGER. Very well; an assistant naval constructor is as much a naval constructor as a principal one is.

Mr. POLAND. That is what we suppose, and it is what we propose to accomplish by this amendment.

Mr. CONGER. No; because another portion of the same law divides them into grades. The office of assistant naval constructor having been established by law, and the officer having been given grade, the requirement of law for him to perform duty should not be left out.

Mr. POLAND. We left the statute just as we found it.

Mr. CONGER. You left one branch of it.

Mr. POLAND. No; the whole of it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. On page 309 I move to amend by inserting before section 1430 a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. The officers of vessels of the United States shall in all cases be citizens of the United States.

I will say that section 9, on page 697 of volume 1, commissioners' revision, was stricken out by them from their final official report. This is found in the eight volumes in the room of the Committee on Revision of the Laws. The section which the commissioners reported is found as section 4194 in Durant's revision, on page 1048.

The section as there reported applies only to commanders—not to all officers of vessels.

Some question has been made as to whether this section which I have offered applies to vessels in the Navy or to merchant-vessels. The Committee on Revision of the Laws determined this morning, after a tolerably careful examination, that it applied to officers of both classes of vessels, and directed that it should be inserted as a new section, preceding section 430. Of course the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. E. R. HOAR,] who has charge of that portion of Durant's revision on page 1048, will consider the question whether it ought to be reincorporated in terms as a part of section 4194, as I have no doubt it will be.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Yes, sir; I have marked it to be inserted there.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The next section to which I propose to offer an amendment is section 1588.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1588. The pay of all officers of the Navy who have been retired after forty-five years' service, after reaching the age of sixteen years, or who have been or may be retired after forty years' service, upon their own application to the President, or on attaining the age of sixty-two years, or on account of incapacity resulting from long and faithful service, from wounds received in the line of duty, or from sickness or exposure therein, shall, when not on active duty, be equal to 75 per cent. of the sea-pay provided by this chapter for the grade or rank which they held, respectively, at the time of their retirement. The pay of all other officers on the retired list shall, when not on active duty, be equal to one-half the sea-pay provided by this chapter for the grade or rank held by them, respectively, at the time of their retirement.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to amend by inserting after the word "wounds," in line 6, the words "or injuries"

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I desire to move an amendment to section 1664.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1664. The several compensations fixed by the preceding section for master-armorers and inspectors shall be paid quarter-yearly. All ordnance store-keepers and paymasters shall give bond and security for the faithful discharge of their duties in such sum as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to amend by striking out the word "ordnance," in line 3, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "military." This word is found in the act of August 23, 1842.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The next amendment I wish to offer is to section 1797.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1797. The Chief of Engineers shall have charge of the public buildings and grounds in the District of Columbia, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the President through the Department of the Interior, except those buildings and grounds which are otherwise provided for by law.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to amend by striking out after the word "Department" the words "of the Interior," and inserting before "Department" the word "War."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. Should not the last clause of the section, beginning with the word "except," be struck out?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes, sir; I move to amend by striking out the words "except those buildings and grounds which are otherwise provided for by law."

Mr. CONGER. In the organic act establishing the District of Columbia, or in some amendatory act since passed, has not the supervision of these buildings been given to another officer than the Chief of Engineers? I believe General Babcock has charge of them now.

Mr. POLAND. General Humphreys is Chief of Engineers. General Babcock, I presume, is detailed by him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How would the section, as now proposed to be amended, leave the Capitol?

Mr. LAWRENCE. The Capitol is under the charge of the architect of the Capitol extension. I see that my last amendment is not proper. I withdraw it.

The next section which we wish to amend is section 1798.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1798. All estimates for public buildings and grounds in charge of the Chief of Engineers shall be approved and submitted by the Secretary of the Interior, through the Treasury Department, as other estimates, to the two Houses of Congress; and all appropriations which have been or may be hereafter made for repairs or improvements of the public buildings and grounds in the District of Columbia, and now in charge of the Chief of Engineers, shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to amend by striking out "the Interior" in the third line, and inserting "War;" also by making the same change at the end of the section.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I wish to move an amendment to section 1799, the first clause of which reads as follows:

SEC. 1799. The Chief of Engineers in charge of public buildings and grounds is authorized to employ in his office and about the public buildings and grounds under his control the following persons, who shall receive, respectively, the annual salaries herein named, to be paid upon the order of the Chief of Engineers, namely.

I move to amend by striking out the whole of this section after the word "control," in the third line, and inserting in lieu thereof the following words:

Such number of persons for such employment, at such rates of compensation, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to amend by striking out sections 1804 and 1806, as follows:

SEC. 1804. Every person who maliciously breaks, injures, defaces, or destroys any main or pipe, bend, branch, valve, hydrant, service-pipe, or any other fixture used for the distribution of water throughout the streets and avenues, or for its introduction into the houses, tenements, or buildings of Washington and Georgetown, shall be punishable by imprisonment in the county jail for not more than two years.

SEC. 1806. Every person who maliciously commits any act by reason of which the supply of water, or any part thereof, to the cities of Washington and Georgetown, becomes impure, filthy, or unfit for use, shall be fined not less than $500 nor more than $1,000, or imprisoned at hard labor in the District of Columbia not more than three years nor less than one year.

Those sections are a part of the law, but they are merely local.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. If found anywhere, it should be in a compilation of the laws of the District of Columbia.

Mr. LAWRENCE. They possibly belong to the laws of this District, which we are not attempting to compile in this revision.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I suggest whether an amendment is not required in section 1812, where it provides that the Chief of Engineers shall report to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. E. R. HOAR. Yes, sir; that requires correction.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I will move to amend that section.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1812. The Chief of Engineers shall, as Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, and as Superintendent of the Washington Aqueduct, annually submit the following reports to the respective heads of Departments in time to accompany the annual message of the President to Congress, namely:

First. To the Secretary of the Interior a report of his operations for the preceding year, with an account of the manner in which all appropriations for public buildings and grounds have been applied, including a statement of the number of public lots sold, or remaining unsold, each year, of the condition of the public buildings and grounds, and of the measures necessary to be taken for the care and preservation of all public property under his charge.

Second. To the Secretary of War, a report of the condition, progress, repairs, casualties, and expenditures of the Washington Aqueduct and other public works under his charge.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to amend the section by striking out in lines 3 and 4 the words "respective heads of Departments," and inserting "Secretary of War."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move further to amend the same section by striking out in the first line of the second paragraph the words "to the Secretary of the Interior;" and also by striking out in the first line of the third paragraph the words "to the Secretary of War."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The next section to which I wish to move an amendment is section 1821.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1821. The appointment of the Capitol police shall be made by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the two Houses and the architect of the Capitol extension.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move to amend by striking out the words "the appointment of the Capitol police shall be made," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "there shall be a Capitol police, the members of which shall be appointed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move, on page 402, section 1821, to add to that section these words:

There shall be a captain of Capitol police, and such other members, with such rate of compensation, as may be appropriated for by Congress from year to year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move, in line 2, section 1821, to strike out the letter "s," so as to make it read "sergeant" instead of "sergeants-at-arms."

Mr. SHANKS. Does not this say we shall provide for these officers in appropriation bills?

Mr. LAWRENCE. There are more clerks in the Treasury Department by authority of appropriation bill four times over than by strict letter of the law.

Mr. SHANKS. We ought not to plead vice by way of extenuation.

Mr. LAWRENCE. We are reporting what the law is, and not what the law should be.

Mr. SHANKS. I understand that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move, in section 1822, to strike out the letter "s," so as to make it read "sergeant-at-arms."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move, on page 404, to strike out section 1838, which reads as follows:

Sec. 1838. All laws of the United States are extended over, and shall have full force and effect within, all the States, and within every new State on its admission into the Union.

I will state, Mr. Speaker, that the commissioners, in their revision, reported a provision similar to this, with a note, saying that language of similar import is found in nearly all of the territorial acts, generally qualified with the expression, "laws not locally inapplicable," but in the admission of Texas the general expression was used as found in this statute.

And this section as found here is undoubtedly the law, except only there is a qualification as to some of the States, that all laws not locally inapplicable shall be in force; but the committee were of the opinion we might safely omit this, because the law is so without putting in any such provision. The laws of the United States, not locally inapplicable, are in force in every State admitted into the Union, and it is not necessary to spread upon the statute-books what is so palpably the clear law without it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It is in the commissioners' revision as follows:

"SEC. 3. All laws of the United States are extended over, and shall have full force and effect within, all the States, and within every new State on its admission into the Union."

Laws of United States extended over all the States.

29 Dec., 1845, ch. 1, vol. 9, p. 1.

Language of similar import, with the qualifying words, however, "laws not locally inapplicable," is found in the acts of admission of nine States, namely: Tennessee, Louisiana, Arkansas, Iowa, Florida, Minnesota, California, Nevada, and Nebraska. But on the admission of Texas, Congress used terms without limit or qualification; and the above section is substantially drawn from that act. If any such provision is important at all, it has seemed to us best to incorporate it, in some proper form, for all time, in the general and permanent law.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move, on page 404, to strike out section 1839, which is as follows:

SEC. 1839. Every new State, on its admission into the Union, shall be entitled to one Representative in the House of Representatives, unless the ratio of population, according to the last general census preceding its admission, entitles such State to a larger number.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I will state the first part of that section is already in the Constitution and the last part of it is not the law. That question was discussed in this House when we had under discussion Durant's revision, pages 5 and 6, chapter 2. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. E. R. HOAR] explained all that, and it is not necessary to explain it any further. Here is what the commissioners say in their revision on that section:

Representation o new States.

2 Feb., 1872, ch. 11, § 5, vol. 17, p. 29.

"SEC. 6. Every new State, on its admission into the Union, shall be entitled to one Representative in the House of Representatives, unless the ratio of population, according to the last general census preceding its admission, entitles such State to a larger number."

NOTE.—Congress has almost uniformly declared what representation a new State shall be entitled to in the House of Representatives. Fifteen States have been admitted with one Representative, to wit: Tennessee, Ohio, Indiana, Louisiana, Mississippi, Illinois, Alabama, Arkansas, Iowa, Florida, Kansas, Oregon, Missouri, Nevada, and Nebraska. Three have been admitted with two: Texas, Minnesota, and California. Two have been admitted with three: Wisconsin and West Virginia; while nothing is said in the acts of admission about representation concerning Kentucky, Vermont, Maine, and Michigan. The terms of the above section are more general than those in the act cited in the margin, which restricts the ratio of representation of new States to the standard, as fixed by the act of apportionment under the ninth census.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move, on page 405, to strike out section 1841, which is as follows:

SEC. 1841. Nothing in this title shall be construed to inhibit the Government of the United States from dividing any Territory, or from changing its boundaries, in such manner and at such time as Congress may deem convenient and proper, or from attaching any portion of such Territory to any other State or Territory.

That is found in the statute, but the committee were of the opinion the law is equally clear without inserting it, because nothing in this statute, or any other, can be construed to prevent the Government of the United States dividing any Territory, &c. It is not necessary to re-enact the law of God. Here is what the commissioners in their revision say about it:

Division and boundaries of the Territories.

New Mex., 9 Sept., 1850, ch. 49, § 2, vol. 9, p. 447.
Utah, 9 Sept., 1850, ch. 51, § 1, vol. 9, p. 453.
Colo., 28 Feb., 1861; ch. 59, § 1, vol. 12, p. 172.
Idaho, 3 Mar., 1863, ch. 117, § 1, vol. 12, p. 808.
Dak., 2 Mar., 1861, ch. 86, § 1, vol. 12, p. 239.
Ariz., 24 Feb., 1863, ch. 56, § 1, vol. 12, p. 664.
Mont., 26 May, 1864, ch. 95, § 1, vol. 13, p. 85.
Wyo., 25 July, 1868, ch. 235, § 1, vol. 15, p. 178.

"SECTION 1. Nothing in this title shall be construed to inhibit the Government of the United States from dividing any Territory, or from changing its boundaries, in such manner and at such time as Congress may deem convenient and proper, or from attaching any portion of such Territory to any other State or Territory."

NOTE.—No such provision is found in the act establishing Washington Territory, whether by inadvertence or design we cannot determine. It is, however, an omission which, it seems to us, should be supplied. We have, therefore, made the provision general.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move on page 436, section 1994, line 5, after the word "provisions," to insert the word "or;" so it will read:

SEC. 1994. It shall be lawful for the President of the United States, or such person as he may empower for that purpose, to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia, as may be necessary to aid in the execution of judicial process issued under any of the preceding provisions, or as shall be necessary to prevent the violation and enforce the due execution of the provisions of this title.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I move on page 453, section 2075, to strike out "Washington Territory, California, Arizona, Nevada, Idaho, and Colorado;" so it will read:

SEC. 2075. The salaries of interpreters lawfully employed in the service of the United States in Oregon, Utah, New Mexico, shall be $500 a year each, and of all so employed elsewhere $400 a year each.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I offer another amendment to the same section, as follows:

In line 2, between the word "Utah" and the words "New Mexico," insert the word "and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I have an amendment also to section 1892, page 414.

The section was as follows:

SEC. 1892. The legislative assemblies of the several Territories shall not grant private charters or especial privileges, but they may, by general incorporation acts, permit persons to associate themselves together as bodies corporate for mining, manufacturing, and other industrial pursuits.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I offer the following amendment:

Add at the end of the section the following words:
Or construction or operation of railroads, wagon-roads, irrigating-ditches, and the colonization and improvement of lands in connection therewith, or for colleges, seminaries, churches, libraries, or any benevolent, charitable, or scientific association.

Mr. CONGER. Is that in the law now?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes, sir; it is found in the law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. This is as far as the committee is prepared to go to-night; and I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at nine o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. BAYARD. I present a petition from bankers, merchants, and citizens of the city of Baltimore, Maryland, representing the alarm which they feel at the various propositions before Congress for the increase of the volume of the currency; declaring that they deem any additional issue of paper money, directly by the Government or indirectly by the national banks, to be highly injurious to the interests of the nation; declaring also their belief of the great injury to the commercial interests of the country to result from the persistence in the use of an irredeemable paper currency, and praying that no more issue of paper may take place, and that the greenbacks already out, of the so-called reserve, may be withdrawn as speedily as possible.

The petition is signed by Alexander Brown & Sons and numerous others, representatives of the national banks of the city of Baltimore, representatives of the largest commercial and banking interests of the city of Baltimore, all agreeing upon the same state of facts, and all urging the same treatment of those facts.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have had put in my hands, Mr. President, a memorial addressed to the House and the Senate by the governor of this District, in which he makes certain statements in relation to a memorial which was presented a few days since by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] I ask that it be received by the Senate; and inasmuch as that memorial was read at length, to do equal justice to this memorialist I ask that his memorial shall also be read, and then lie upon the table, together with the memorial presented by the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

Your memorialist, the governor of the District of Columbia, respectfully represents, that, in common with other officers of said District, he has been arraigned before your honorable body by two memorials of certain pretended tax-payers, in which your memorialist and his associates are charged with grave offenses. Charges so gravely presented, and apparently so gravely made, demand of your memorialist, on the part of himself and associates, as a duty they owe to themselves and the good people of the District, to place before your honorable body certain facts of record and of public notoriety touching both the allegations made and the persons making them.

Your memorialist, speaking for himself and associates in office, declares that they have not sought, and do not now seek, to evade the fullest and fairest investigation into the affairs of the District; and as proof thereof they remind your honorable body that at every session of Congress since the organization of the new government for the District, they have been before the District Committee and Committees on Appropriations of both the Senate and House of Representatives with full exhibits of all the transactions of said District; that at the second session of the Forty-second Congress an investigation was ordered by the House of Representatives on the 22d January, 1872, which was continued throughout the winter and till May of the same year, when a report was made (No. 72) covering nearly one thousand printed pages, and embracing record evidence and oral testimony upon every substantial allegation presented by the memorialists of your honorable body at this session of Congress; that said investigation was regarded by the Forty-second Congress as an impartial, thorough, and searching inquiry into every expenditure of the District government; of the prudence, wisdom, and honesty of the expenditure, and of the durability and valuableness to the District of the improvements then made and proposed to be made; that at said investigation the entire plan of improvement complained of by said memorialists was examined and approved, and so reported by said committee; that your memorialist, and his associates were not only warranted by said report to go forward with their plan, but they were further encouraged by appropriations made by the Forty-second Congress in furtherance of said plan, as well also by the apparently universal approval of the whole country, and especially by a large majority of the citizens of the District of Columbia; that at the following and the last session of the Forty-second Congress, complaints having been made that the District authorities were exceeding the limits of the general debt of the District, a second investigation was ordered, the result of which will be found in House report No. 7, third session. The confidence of Congress still remaining in the integrity of the District officers, further appropriations were made. And at the present session of the Forty-third Congress your memorialist invited an investigation, which, under the order of the House of Representatives, is now being made, and covers every substantial allegation not heretofore finally and fully considered.

Your memorialist now insists that unless probable cause is shown for the existence of the evils heretofore and now complained of, and which have been disproved before Congress, he and his associates ought not to be subjected, at great expense to the General Government and to the great detriment of the interests of the District, to further needless and fruitless investigation.

Your memorialist further represents that full and complete printed reports have been made to the President, as provided by law, showing in detail all the financial transactions of the officers of said District government; every expenditure of the board of public works, with the date and name of person receiving money; full, ample, and complete reports of all the improvements made, of the character and place where made, and the cost thereof. There never has been any concealment on the part of your memorialist and his assistants from the public of a single official transaction of said District government; there never has been a time when it was not within the power of any citizen of the District to challenge the wisdom of any improvement being made, or the expenditure of any money; and your memorialist declares that there is no substantial grievances complained of to your honorable body for which there is not ample remedy provided by law through the courts of the District.

Your memorialist would respectfully represent to your honorable body that the difficulties and embarrassments which have resulted from the factious and unreasonable opposition of certain citizens, of whom the memorialists complaining to your honorable body are a fair type and part, have been such as at times to threaten the destruction of all government in the District, and have resulted in incalculable pecuniary damage to the citizens thereof. This opposition arrayed itself even before the District government was fully organized; and while your memorialist, as he feels bound to do, presents to your honorable body some of the vicissitudes through which the District government has passed by reason of this opposition, he calls attention to the fact that from the beginning the people of the District, and those most interested in its welfare, have sustained it with great unanimity.

Your memorialist says that at the first election held under the organic act, the question of liberal improvements was made an issue, and was approved by a vote of several thousand majority in favor of the plan then discussed. Later, on the assembling of the Legislature, this plan was made known to said body by message of the governor, and at once became the topic of general discussion. It had received the approval of an advisory board of eminent Government officers and private citizens, and was enacted into law by act of July 10, 1871. Every effort was made to defeat this legislation; failing in which, resort was had to the courts, and an injunction obtained, chiefly on the ground that the proposed loan had not received the indorsement of the people. Unwilling to wait the slow process of law, another act was passed submitting the question to the people. The opposition organized in every part of the District, and attacked not only the plan of improvements, but assailed the personal character and integrity, both in private and public life, of the officers whom the President had appointed and the people had elected to carry out the organic act. Not one dollar had thus far been expended, nor had these officers been afforded a single opportunity to show whether they intended an honest or dishonest administration of affairs. After the fullest canvass of the question, only 1,213 votes in the whole District were cast against the loan and improvements. Almost the entire working season was thus consumed when, in November, the District authorities placed the loan upon the market; whereupon the opposition, aided by the pecuniary and moral support of some of those now complaining to your honorable body, sought to discredit the District in the money markets of the world, and prevent the negotiation of its bonds.

Upon the assembling of the last Congress an effort was made by these factionists to suspend the functions of the new government and thus to strike a blow at its very existence, and destroy its credit both at home and abroad. The attempt, however, failed, receiving no sympathy in your honorable body when the proposition was presented. At the same time a memorial was offered in the House of Representatives demanding an investigation into charges covering, substantially, the same complaints as have been recently made to your honorable body, the result of which was a report completely vindicating the District authorities.

Your memorialist further says that, substantially, every charge of unlawful exercise of power by the District authorities now complained of has been presented to the courts of the District, and in every instance the District authorities have been sustained; that at every election, of which there have been several, the people of the District have sustained its officers by large majorities; that notwithstanding attacks through the public press and the utmost efforts of the factionists of the District, already alluded to, which, for malevolence, unscrupulousness, and want of truth, have been unparalleled, still your memorialist believes that the officers thus assailed have not forfeited the respect of the public at large, or of the citizens of the District, but would be fully vindicated before your honorable body if their voices could be heard.

Your memorialist denies that the opposition now demanding a third or fourth investigation are law-abiding citizens, or are seeking the good of the District; but says their whole purpose is either to overthrow the present form of government or to cause the removal of officers whose appointment they cannot themselves dictate.

Your memorialist further says that before giving heed to the complaints made to your honorable body they should be presented at least by those who come with clean hands, and are willing to abide by the laws which they charge have been violated; whereas, as will be seen by the exhibit hereto attached, certified by the superintendent of assessments, the fact is shown that of said complainants the largest property-holders, namely, Messrs. W. W. Corcoran, George W. Riggs, William Gunton, Marshall Brown, Edmund Handley, William B. Webb, H. N. Easby, George E. Kirk, Charles W. Matthews, Henry S. Davis, A. Adamson, William Rutherford, H. K. Randall, S. D. Castleman, and Columbus Alexander, have personally paid nothing on account of the improvements against which they protest, in defiance of the law of Congress approved February 21, 1871, specifically providing "that upon the property adjoining, and to be especially benefited by the improvements authorized by law, there shall be assessed and collected a reasonable proportion of the cost, not exceeding one-third thereof."

The pecuniary ability of said individuals to pay the amount so assessed against them being unquestioned, they stand before your honorable body as willful violators of law; for having, as hereinbefore set forth, appealed to the courts and suffered defeat upon the identical issues embraced in their memorial, they cannot plead ignorance of the law or want of means to comply with its demands.

Your memorialist, on behalf of his associates and the patriotic and public-spirited people of the District of Columbia, points with pride to the increased prosperity of the District under its new government. In spite of unparalleled opposition; of malicious and criminal misrepresentations; of attempts on the part of the opposition to arouse the people to the commission of public crimes—going to the extent even of threatening the lives of your memorialist and his associates, and notwithstanding a determined and implacable attack on the part of certain newspapers of the country, sustained from week to week by malicious and willful falsehoods, the capital of the nation has been transformed from an unattractive, unhealthy, unsightly place into the most beautiful city of our country; the most desirable for residence, and has given evidence of prosperity as great as that of any city of the Union. In the midst of all its trials and all opposition, and the midst of all the alleged burdens of taxation, threatening confiscation, as has been charged, your memorialist would call attention to the fact, as a complete refutation of all the charges brought against him and his associates, that the transactions in real estate in the city of Washington have increased from $4,927,000 in 1870 to $12,195,300 in 1873.

Disclaiming all purpose to evade any reasonable and proper investigations, your memorialist submits whether, under all the circumstances, it would be fair and just to the people of the country, to the people of the District, and to your memorialist and his associates, to enter upon an inquest without some probable cause shown of the truth of the charges made.

ALEXANDER R. SHEPHERD.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask to have the last sentence read again.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Disclaiming all purpose to evade any reasonable and proper investigation, your memorialist submits whether, under all the circumstances, it would be fair and just to the people of the country and the people of the District, and to your memorialist and his associates, to enter upon an inquest without some probable cause shown of the truth of the charges made.

Mr. THURMAN. I will thank the Secretary to read the first sentence of that memorial.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Your memorialist, the governor of the District of Columbia, respectfully represents that, in common with other officers of said government, he has been arraigned before your honorable body by two memorials of certain pretended tax-payers——

Mr. THURMAN. That will do, Mr. President. At the proper time I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate to allow me to make some remarks upon that very extraordinary paper, for a very extraordinary paper it is, which begins with setting out that the persons who have heretofore petitioned Congress on this subject are "pretended tax-payers;" a very extraordinary paper it is, which professes all the while to desire investigation and to have skirts perfectly clean, and yet submits a long argument against any investigation at all; and a very extraordinary paper it is, which says that the charges made in the memorials presented by me have all been investigated by the courts, when many of those charges could not come before the courts at all, and have not come before them; and a very extraordinary paper it is, which says that the House of Representatives at this session have ordered an investigation that covers all the grounds of the petitions that have been presented to this body, when the fact is that that investigation is an investigation merely of the books of the officers of this District.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What have we to do with that question in either case?

Mr. THURMAN. This memorial brings it here. But, sir, I do not wish to speak at large on this subject now, for it would occupy much time, and require preparation. I suppose the Senator who presents this memorial will be willing that it may, with the petitions which have been heretofore presented, lie on the table until the proper time comes for action.

Mr. HAMLIN. That was the motion I made.

Mr. CONKLING. Before this matter passes away I wish to say a word, with the indulgence of the Senator from Maine, not touching the merits of this or the other petitions relating to a subject in which I feel no interest except that justice may be done; but to note the fact that no request has been made to print the memorial just read. Had such a request or motion been made, I should have objected, as the Senator from Rhode Island objected some days ago to the printing of a memorial which I thought was of exceptional importance, and as other Senators have objected in other instances. I would attract the attention at least of the Senate to this point, for a reason I will state.

On a recent occasion, when a memorial relating to affairs in this District was presented and read at length, I think——

Mr. SHERMAN. Read in full.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator says it was read in full, and no objection was made. A suggestion rather than a motion came from the Senator from Ohio farthest from me [Mr. THURMAN] that it should be printed, and I reminded him that the rule and practice of the Senate was the other way, and that the printing of petitions, even in important cases, had been refused in all cases alike during the present session.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to correct him? When I presented the first petition, I asked that it might be printed. Objection was made to that, and I said I was indifferent about it. A motion was then made to print by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY,] and that motion was referred to the Committee on Printing. That committee reported adversely to printing it, on the ground that it was not customary to print petitions of private individuals. That led to some little discussion, which was going on when I came into the Senate Chamber——

Mr. CONKLING. As the Senator is now himself interrupted by another Senator, I wish he would let me say what he is anticipating, and what I rose to say the Senator by his interruption prevents a statement as much in his behalf as in mine. I beg him to allow me to proceed for a moment, and then I will yield the floor.

I was about to remind the Senate of the facts to which the Senator has adverted, and I had gone so far as to say that he made the suggestion, rather than the motion, that a memorial should be printed, when an objection was made, the objection being to call his attention to the fact that it was not the usage of the Senate to print memorials, and that printing had been refused in all cases. Subsequently the Senator from Delaware made the motion to print the memorial. Under the rule the motion went to the Committee on Printing; and a report was made afterwards, that it should not be printed for reasons assigned, and treating it as all other memorials and petitions whatsoever had been treated. Thus the petition was received and treated just like all other petitions, except that it was read in full—a consideration not usually bestowed upon petitions.

Mr. President, having stated the facts I will now state my motive for bringing the matter to the attention of the Senate.

There has been sent out generally to the country (my attention has been brought to it in papers printed in different States) a statement that on the occasion in question the Senate refused to receive the petition, refused to allow it to be read, and excluded it altogether. I might say that the public journals which have made these statements, have not, I think, paid a compliment to their own intelligence. The suspicion suggests itself that the writers of these statements do not understand that, imbedded in the Constitution itself, among the fundamental rights of the people, beyond the reach of the Senate, is the right of petition, which no Senate or House would dare thus to trample on.

Notwithstanding the groundlessness and absurdity of the statement, the public has been informed, and probably many persons have not stopped to doubt it, that my honorable friend from Ohio nearest me, [Mr. SHERMAN,] by dint of his parliamentary skill—I believe it was called "a parliamentary quibble" in several of the statements—I furnishing such feeble and secondary aid as I could, that we together induced or caused the Senate to refuse to receive a petition, to shut it out altogether, to refuse to have it read; and thereupon dismal homilies are hung, which, inasmuch as they relate only, or chiefly, to the honorable Senator from Ohio nearest me and myself personally, I will not comment one. It seemd to me, as it seemed to the Senator from Ohio upon consulting with him, that it might be our duty to bring this to the attention of the Senate, and possibly succeed in bringing it to the attention of at least a narrow circle beyond, in order that no portion of the public might from our silence suppose that the Senate of the United States had trampled the Constitution under foot by refusing to receive a petition, when the truth is wholly otherwise, and when in the matter of printing, as in the case of a memorial presented by me for the Chamber of Commerce of New York, touching a matter of grave magnitude, and as in all other cases where a request to print memorials have been made, the Senate simply stood by its rule and said, let this petition be presented. let this particular petition be read at length, which rarely occurs, and let the Senator who presents it refer it to such committee as he pleases; let it lie upon the table if he pleases, and let it have its full force and effect in all regards.

I will only add that I should not have brought this to the attention of the Senate, had it been a matter which related to me alone, or to the Senator from Ohio. I have yet to reach the time when I will occupy the attention of the Senate to deny allegations in newspapers merely personal to me. But I thought the version given to this matter gave it larger than personal dimensions, and that a correction was due to the Senate and to the editors of the papers honestly misled, like the editor of the Brooklyn Argus, a paper edited, I think, with intelligence and fairness; he evidently has been so far imposed upon as to accept the statement, and he has not yet ceased to reiterate his indignation and amazement that such a thing could occurr in the United States Senate, as well he might; and I hope I have not wholly wasted time in calling attention to the fact that no such thing did occur, and no such thing by possibility could occur in any case in this body.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This memorial will lie on the table.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. RAMSEY, it was Ordered, That two memorials of the Legislature of Dakota, dated January 24, 1873, and February 18, 1873, asking the improvement of the Red River of the North, with accompanying papers, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion of Mr. RAMSEY, it was Ordered, That Mrs. Anna W. Osborne have leave to withdraw her petition and papers from the files.

On motion of Mr. MORTON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of R. S. McRay be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. BOREMAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Hiram W. Love, of Johnson County, Iowa, praying compensation for cotton crop destroyed by the Army during the late war, submitted a report, acccompanied by a bill (S. No. 398) for the relief of Hiram W. Love.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of the United States asking the enactment of a law giving precedence in the courts of the United States to proceedings for the redress of wrongs of seamen, to report the same back, and ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, inasmuch as it proposes a change in the proceedings of the courts.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was recommitted the bill (S. No. 87) to facilitate the execution of, and to protect, certain public works of improvement at the mouth of the Mississippi River, have directed me to report the same back with an amendment, and recommend its passage; and as it is very important that the bill should pass, I ask present action on it, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read at length.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DAVIS. There is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will lie over.

Mr. BOUTWELL subsequently said: I should like to have the unanimous consent of the Senate to submit an amendment to Senate bill No. 87, and to move that the bill, as amended by the report of the Committee on Commerce, and with the amendment which I now propose, may be printed for the use of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan.) That order will be made.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Sarah Brooks, praying compensation for injuries inflicted on her person by Indians in the State of Kansas, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1013) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875, to report it with amendments; and I give notice to the Senate that I shall call it up early next week and press for action upon it.

Mr. PRATT, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Ruth Ellen Greeland, widow of John H. Greeland, late captain Fourth Artillery, United States Army, praying for a pension, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 42) granting a pension to Caleb A. Lamb, late a musician in Company E, Forty-sixth Regiment of Indiana Volunteer Infantry, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 387) granting a pension to Captain Benjamin Farley, Company C, Fifth Indiana Cavalry, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of William T. Parker, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Karl Mook, praying the payment of arrears of pension to the heir of August Kessler, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Colonel William C. Ives, late of the One hundred and sixteenth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, praying for a pension, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 9) to repeal so much of the act of March 3, 1873, as increases the salaries therein named, have directed me to report it back; and inasmuch as the same subject-matter has been disposed of by a House bill, to move that this bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives for the printing and distribution of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, have instructed me to report it back with amendments; and I ask for its present consideration, as Senators and Members are anxious to know what is to be done with the RECORD.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the Congressional Printer be instructed to furnish to each Senator, and to each Member and Delegate in the House of Representatives, twenty-four copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or of any such like official report of the debates in Congress as may hereafter be authorized by law, either daily, as originally published, or in the revised form, without binding, or in bound volumes, or part in each form, as each Senator, Member, and Delegate may elect.

The Committee on Printing proposed to amend the resolution so as to make it read:

That the Congressional Printer be directed to furnish thirty-one hundred copies for the use of the Senate, and seventy-two hundred and fifty copies for the use of the House of Representatives, of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or of any such other like official publication of the debates in Congress as may hereafter be authorized by law, either daily, as originally published, or in the revised form, without binding, or in bound volumes, or part in each form, as each Senator, Member, and Delegate receiving the same may elect.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I wish the Senate to understand the resolution. The number assigned to the House of Representatives is the same that they now have, and which is fixed in the resolution which they sent over to us. The number assigned to the Senate, which of this document has been always much larger than to the House, has been cut down one-half. The number assigned to the Members of the House, and Delegates, is twenty-four each, and to the Senators forty each. It has always been customary to supply certain documents more largely to the House, and certain other documents more largely to the Senate, per capita. For instance, the Agricultural Report has always been furnished much more numerously to the House than to the Senate. The Congressional Globe was always furnished more numerously to the Senate for very evident reasons, as Senators are expected to supply State institutions, and also to supply some persons, newspapers, or libraries in districts where the member of the House and the Senator are not of the same politics. This resolution, if passed, cuts our supply down one-half and leaves the House as it was, putting ours at forty copies and theirs at twenty-four each.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

POSTAL-CAR FACILITIES.

Mr. WINDOM submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be directed to report to the Senate the number of postal-car clerks and employés now employed on the lines between Washington and New York, New York and Boston, between New York, Albany, Buffalo, and Suspension Bridge; the gross amount of their annual compensation, the amount paid for the transportation of the mails on said lines, and what additional compensation the railroads demand for this service; also the number of daily express trains on each of said routes, and what reduction of the expense of the mail service and what increase in the frequency of the service and greater dispatch in the delivery of the bills can be effected by the withdrawal of the postal cars from said routes and substituting a more frequent service by transmitting the mails on all express or local trains running, or that may hereafter be run, over said routes.

PRINTING OF A DOCUMENT.

Mr. BOREMAN. I have received a statement from the Secretary of the Treasury in regard to the expenses and charges upon the Treasury of each of the Territories. It became necessary for me to have this information on account of matter before the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman, and I ask that it be printed. I think it is a document that ought to be put in a bound volume, for the information of Senators.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to print will be made, if there be no objection.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 399) concerning the practice in territorial courts and appeals therefrom; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOREMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 400) for the relief of the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal church at New Creek, West Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, (by request,) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 401) to establish a uniform registry of sea-going vessels, to afford protection to life on ship-board, and to govern rebates in duties on merchandise damaged on the voyage of importation; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. NORWOOD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 402) to restore the franking privilege; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 403) confirming the title in lands to persons claiming under the homestead law in all cases where such claimants have settled on said lands in good faith and made valuable improvements thereon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

GENERAL O. O. HOWARD.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask leave, without previous notice, to introduce a joint resolution authorizing a special court of inquiry concerning General O. O. Howard, and I should like to have it read.

Mr. SUMNER. Should not that be a bill, under our new rule, the understanding being to do away as much as possible with joint resolutions?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The Chair understands that to be the rule. It should be in the form of a bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Very well; let it be amended accordingly.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 404) authorizing a special court of inquiry concerning General O. O. Howard; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask that the bill be read at length for information, and then I shall ask for its present consideration, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized and requested to convene a court of inquiry, to consist of not less than five officers of the Army, whose duty it shall be when so convened to fully investigate all the charges against Brigadier-General O. O. Howard contained in the communication of the Secretary of War to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the date of December 5, 1873, and to report their opinion as well upon the moral as upon the technical and legal responsibility for such offenses, if any, as may be discovered.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I desire to make a single remark, and then to ask the present consideration of this bill.

Public attention has been called to the management by this distinguished officer of the affairs of the Freedmen's Bureau while at the head of that service, and certain proceedings have been instituted in relation to it which I am advised this bill, if passed at the present time, will facilitate. Therefore, as a matter of public interest, as also a matter which I think due to that officer, and with a view of facilitating that inquiry, I introduce this bill; and if there be no objection I should like to have it passed upon.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. WEST. It is proposed to pass that bill without any reference to a committee. It occurs to me that we are infringing on the usages of the Army in this case.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state to the Senate that the Senator from Maine submitted the resolution to me, and I said to him that I did not desire its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs, because I thought it was a resolution that ought to pass, and referring it to the committee and bringing it back would only take up time. Hence I suggested to him to introduce it and ask for its present consideration; and I will state, as I am up, the reason for it.

As I understand, the period named in the statute of limitations has expired, so that the Secretary of War cannot convene a court-martial for the purpose of trying these charges. Therefore the necessity arises for a bill or resolution being passed by Congress to give the authorization to the President to call a court. That being the only question involved, I suggested to my friend from Maine to have the bill passed without reference to a committee.

Mr. WEST. It is very true, as the chairman of the Military Committee states, that if the statute of limitations has precluded a remedy in this case a new statute would be necessary; but there is no statute that requires to be passed in order to institute a court of inquiry, which I understand this bill to provide for. The Senator from Illinois speaks of a court-martial. Here is a provision that the President of the United States shall convene a court of inquiry, and I ask him if there is any statute that either prohibits that or requires it, or whether it is necessary that one should be passed to authorize it? It is optional with the President to order one, as I understand.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Of course if any gentleman on the Military Committee desires its reference, I have no objection; but it seemed to me a matter so obvious that a reference might not be necessary. The Senator from Louisiana perhaps was not in when I made the observation that this is done to facilitate proceedings which may be taken elsewhere; and I am advised that if this be done here it would facilitate—not originating here, but it originates in a communication to the House of Representatives made by the Secretary of War, which is referred to in this resolution. Its passage here will facilitate proceedings which are being taken elsewhere in harmony with this, as I am advised. Still, if any gentleman desires to make the motion to refer, I shall not object.

Mr. WEST. I shall not make any motion to commit to a committee, but I will ask that the matter be held in abeyance for a few moments, until I can get some further information on the subject. We can take it up again.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not object to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) Then the bill will be laid aside for the present.

POINT LOOKOUT RAILROAD.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to consider if any further legislation is needed to protect the interests of the United States in the lands of the Government Hospital for the Insane of the Army and the Navy, and also the riparian rights of the United States on the Anacostia and Potomac Rivers attached to such lands, so far as the same are impaired by the Point Lookout Railroad.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. E. BABCOCK, his Secretary, announced that the President had, on the 29th instant, approved and signed the bill (S. No. 61) providing for busts of the late Chief Justices Roger Brooke Taney and Salmon Portland Chase, to be placed in the Supreme Court Room of the United States.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate, being the resolution in relation to the admission of Mr. Pinchback as Senator from Louisiana. The Secretary will report the resolution and amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution submitted by Mr. MORTON, on the 26th of January, is as follows:

Resolved, That the credentials of the Hon. P. B. S. Pinchback be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections; that the committee have power to send for persons and papers, and be instructed to inquire into the conduct of said Pinchback in connection with said election.

Mr. CARPENTER resumed and concluded the speech begun by him yesterday. His speech in full is as follows:

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I have no ambition to make a speech to-day, and shall not attempt to do so. An English writer, intending to be very severe, has paid Americans an unintended compliment when he says that no American can make a speech unless he can glorify his country about something. Sir, I trust the glory of America will long remain to inspire American eloquence. I trust the day is far distant when our bards shall sing and our orators lament the decadence of American greatness. But, sir, unfortunately, in this business there is nothing to call forth songs of joy; nothing to inspire one note of exultation. I never reflect upon the present attitude of the United States toward the State of Louisiana without mingled emotions of sorrow and shame. It was my purpose, at the commencement of the session, to say nothing in regard to this subject; but having been upon the committee which investigated this matter at the last session, and having prepared the report, I may, without vanity, suppose that I am more familiar with the facts of the case than Senators who were not upon the committee, and it is perhaps my duty to make a plain statement of the case to the Senate.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] opened the debate on this subject with his accustomed skill. That Senator, when he leads in the right direction, moves with such power, that it is an easy task to follow; but when, as he rarely does, he goes wrong, he is a very troublesome opponent. The speech which he made upon this subject, on presenting the resolution, is an illustration of this. Fact and fiction, logical conclusions and audacious assumptions, are so mingled, that close thought and examination are necessaryto determine where the reasoning ends and the fallacy begins.

Mr. President, I shall attempt this afternoon to reply to that speech, and I shall attempt to state the facts of this case and the questions of law involved in it.

The Senator commenced his remarks by controverting the statement of Senators that there had already been an investigation of this subject. He says:

I submit that they are both mistaken—

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. STOCKTON] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. ALCORN] are alluded to—that this question has never been before the committee, nor has it ever been before the Senate; and so far as that volume of testimony is concerned—

Meaning the report of the committee—

while I have no sort of objection to anybody referring to it for any purpose, it is no part of the res gestæ; it is not a part of this case; it was taken before a different committee. The committee has been twice reorganized since that time. It was taken at a former session of Congress, in a proceeding to which Mr. Pinchback was not a party, and for which he is nowise responsible; and while it is here for reference, as every document in the document-room is and every book in the library is, it is no part of this case.

Mr. President, let us see about this. I hold in my hand the credentials of Mr. Pinchback and the credentials of Mr. Ray, Mr. Kellogg signing both as governor of the State, and certifying in one case that on the 15th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1873, the Legislature of that State elected Mr. Pinchback for the term to commence on the 4th of March, 1873, and in the other that the same Legislature, on the same day, elected Mr. Ray to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Mr. Kellogg. These credentials show that these gentlemen were elected on the same day. Mr. Ray presented his credentials at the last regular session of the Senate and claimed his seat. Mr. Pinchback presented his credentials at our extra session last spring, and now claims his seat.

The Senator from Indiana, speaking of Pinchback's rights, says:

The first proposition that I present on the resolution that I have offered is that Mr. Pinchback is entitled, upon his credentials, to be sworn in and take his seat as a member of this body; that he presents what is called a prima facie case, and upon that case he is entitled to be sworn in, and if there are grounds of contest, either because he was not elected by the right Legislature, or was elected by fraud or bribery, or that there was not a quorum of the two houses present, or that he was not elected in conformity to the act of Congress of 1866, those grounds of contest can only be urged after he has been sworn in and taken his seat, &c.

The Senator from Indiana was chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections when Mr. Ray came here in February last and presented his credentials. Why was not Mr. Ray seated on a prima facie case? Then, if ever, we had a prima facie case; we had this certificate from the pretended governor of that State, under what purports to be the great seal of the State, in due form, and certifying to the election of Mr. Ray. Why was he not seated on his prima facie case? We all know why. The air was filled with rumors, and Senators were disturbed with doubts whether there was any Legislature in that State, whether there was any governor of the State, whether there was anything valid in the parchment which was laid upon our table; and when Mr. Ray's credentials were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, a Senator—and I think it was the Senator from Indiana—offered a resolution requiring the committee "to inquire and report to the Senate whether there is any existing State government in Louisiana, and how and by whom it was constituted." It was because the Senator from Indiana doubted the existence of a lawful Legislature to elect Mr. Ray that he offered this resolution; it was because we all disbelieved the fact or doubted it that the resolution was carried unanimously in the Senate, and the whole subject referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The committee devoted weeks to the investigation, and reported to the Senate ten hundred and ninety-four pages of testimony, justifying every apprehension as to the legality of the Legislature. The committee also recommended the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, (first,) That there is no State government at present existing in the State of Louisiana.

Resolved, (second,) That neither John Ray nor W. L. McMillen is entitled to a seat in the Senate, neither having been elected by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana.

And the committee reported a bill to provide for an election of State officers and members of the Legislature for that State. So far as regards the legality of the Kellogg government, the report was concurred in by all the members of the committee, except the Senator from Indiana. Mr. Trumbull, then a member of the committee, dissented from the report made by the majority upon the ground that McEnery and his associates were entitled to be recognized. Mr. Hill, then a member of the committee, dissented from the majority in regard to ordering a new election, and proposed other relief; but the committee, with the single exception of its chairman, were of the opinion that there was no government in the State. So, sir, I say it is entirely too late to talk about seating Mr. Pinchback upon a prima facie case. His prima facie case is overturned. The presumption that might spring from reading these papers is rebutted by the full proof of the fact that a committee of this body unanimously, except one of its members, has reported to you, and that report lies upon your table to-day, or in your document-rooms, that there was no State Legislature and there was no State government in Louisiana on the 15th day of January last, when it is pretended Pinchback was elected.

Again, the Senator says this testimony was not taken in Mr. Pinchback's case; it was taken in Mr. Ray's case, and therefore Mr. Pinchback is not to be affected by it. Why, sir, in a judicial court, for reasons that pertain to such tribunals alone, the testimony taken in a case between Smith and Jones cannot be used in a case between Brown and Gray, for the reason that each is entitled to cross-examine witnesses whose testimony is to affect him.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to correct the Senator in one particular. The resolution instructing the committee to inquire whether there was any State government in Louisiana was offered on the 16th of January, 1873, and the credentials were not presented to the Senate until some time afterward. That investigation was already ordered before the credentials were presented to the Senate.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is wholly immaterial. I thought it was after the credentials were presented. I thank my friend, however, for making that suggestion, because if he is right it ends the objection that it was a proceeding in Mr. Ray's case, and therefore cannot affect Mr. Pinchback. If the investigation had no reference to Mr. Ray's case; if it was an independent proceeding ordered by the Senate to ascertain an important fact upon which we might be called to legislate, then it binds all the world; all mankind were parties to that investigation.

Mr. MORTON. I said it was before the credentials of either were presented.

Mr. CARPENTER. Very well; then it was not a proceeding in Ray's case, and Mr. Pinchback was as much a party to the proceeding as any other citizen of the United States.

Mr. MORTON. In the same way exactly.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not claim that it affects Mr. Pinchback more than any other citizen. I claim that it affects everybody.

In regard to the distinction I am considering between the methods of proceeding in legislative bodies and judicial courts, let me read from Lewis's Reasonings and Methods in Politics:

> The subject of judicial evidence has been treated by jurists with more or less fullness since jurisprudence became a science; but it has, perhaps, been elaborated in more detail, and has received a more systematic form, in England than in any other country. This has been owing to peculiarities in the procedure of our courts of common law, which need not be here noticed. With respect to our present subject, the most important rule of evidence in the law of England is that which prescribes the exclusion of hearsay testimony; that is to say, of statements of fact made by the witness, not from his own observation, but from the observation of others.
> In judicial proceedings, therefore, where the facts are determined, not by official agents of the government but by the testimony of witnesses taken casually from the midst of the community, the general principle is recognized by our law that the witness must speak to an event which occurred under his notice, and within the reach of his senses.
> The process of ascertaining facts for legislative purposes is not, in general, so formal, or subject to such strict rules of evidence as the procedure of executive departments, whether administrative or judicial. Petitions, complaints, remonstrances, statements of grievances, are presented to a legislature, or, if it consist of a deliberative body, individual members of that body may represent facts upon their own authority. It may then either proceed at once to legislate upon the faith of such suggestions; or it may take them as raising merely a presumption, and may institute an inquiry of its own. It may call for papers, accounts, correspondence, and other documents; it may likewise, by proper means, examine witnesses, and thus ascertain, by original testimony, the facts bearing upon the subject under consideration.

So I say that the information which is furnished to the Senate by the report and testimony of this committee not only comes within the rules of evidence upon which legislative bodies must act, but that it was obtained in a proceeding instituted by its own authority, conducted by its own members, exercising its own power to send for persons and papers, and conducted, too, under the supervision of the Senator from Indiana himself; and I say that it is before us, as evidence in this case, and in all cases, and for all purposes. The Senator says it is before us like any other volume in the document-room, or any book in the library. I am willing to accept that expression, because every book in the library which gives us a fact of history applicable to this case, every law-book which discusses the questions involved in this case, and every document in any room of this Capitol which furnishes information bearing upon this subject, is legitimately and properly before us this morning.

The attempt of the Senator to exclude from this case the information obtained by weeks of investigation and the examination of numerous witnesses upon this subject, and to seat Mr. Pinchback upon a prima facie case, is certainly worthy of his ingenuity. He says, "My first proposition is that Pinchback is to be seated upon a prima facie case," and he then refers to the case of Mr. GOLDTHWAITE, and to the remarks of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] upon that suject, I will not say taking care, because it was undoubtedly accidental, but happening to fall upon that particular part of the speech of the Senator from Ohio which did not touch the precise question, and omitting the part of it which did. The Senator from Ohio has been a judge, and he has acquired that habit of methodical and accurate statement which belongs to the bench, and with his statement upon that occasion of what constitutes a prima facie case I entirely concur. But let us see what he did say. I read from the Congressional Globe of January 9, 1872, page 320:

> Mr. THURMAN. The Committee on Privileges and Elections, in accordance with the universal practice of this body from the foundation of the Government to this day, a practice that has not a single exception, reported that the credentials of this gentleman being correct—> and he having been elected by a body competent to elect, he was prima facie entitled to his seat, and to be sworn in.

That is, being in due form—

The Senator from Ohio stated the proposition accurately. When a gentleman comes to this body with credentials in due form, showing that he has been elected by a body authorized to elect a Senator, then he has a prima facie case. The case then before the Senate, and upon which the Senator from Ohio was speaking, was such a case. There was a question made here as to individuals sitting in the Legislature of Alabama, but there was no question that the body itself was the Legislature of the State; and the better opinion is that the Senate has no authority to inquire into the right of individual members of a State Legislature to sit therein, that being a question to be settled by the Legislature, if there be a Legislature to settle it; but the Senate has authority to inquire whether the body which has pretended to elect a Senator was the Legislature of the State. The Legislature alone can elect a Senator, and, therefore, to make a prima facie case it must be shown that the Legislature has made an election.

Mr. MORTON. What is the proper form? A certificate by the governor?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. That is the proper form.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is the proper form of credential; but back of that is the question whether there was any Legislature in Louisiana or not—a question to which we have devoted six weeks of investigation; a question upon which a committee of your body has brought almost eleven hundred pages of testimony to your bar, showing conclusively, as I shall establish, that there was not, on the 15th day of January, 1873, any government whatever in that State, nor any Legislature. Therefore I lay aside what is called the prima facie case with the single remark that it does not exist. We have the credentials in proper form, but we know the fact from our own investigation, instituted independently of Mr. Pinchback's application for a seat, that there was no Legislature in that State on the 15th of January, 1873.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me to call his attention to the fact that the case of Robbins vs. Potter, in 1834, from Rhode Island, was the precise case, where it was contended that Mr. Potter was not elected by a Legislature, but that the Legislature itself was a nullity, having no authority in law; and that in that very case the Senate solemnly decided after a discussion that as his credentials were in regular form, signed by the governor of Rhode Island, he must first be seated, and the question as to whether he was elected by the Legislature of Rhode Island be decided afterward.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend allow me to remind him that the report in that case shows that it was not such a case as this?

Mr. MORTON. Prove it by the report.

Mr. CARPENTER. I shall prove it by the report. I have it here; I have it marked; and I only ask my friend to be a little patient, because it is impossible for me to discuss all the points in this case at the same instant.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator said he was passing from the prima facie case, and that was the reason I made that remark.

Mr. CARPENTER. I intended to pass from the asserted prima facie case, because there was no prima facie case here. But, certainly, I shall attend to the case of Robbins; I will not forget it; I have it noted.

The fact was, in GOLDTHWAITE'S case, that there was but one man in that State who claimed to be governor; there was but one body claiming to be the Legislature. As a court is bound to take judicial notice, so we are bound to take legislative notice of the component parts of this Union and their condition; and we may form our judgment, as Lewis says, from petition, and remonstrances, and newspaper reports, or from the representations of Senators who come from the locality, or we may institute investigations of our own. In this case it happens that all these sources of information have been drawn upon, and the result is embodied in the report of the committee to which I have referred, that on the 15th day of January, 1873, there was no Legislature in the State of Louisiana.

Let me come now to the case of Robbins. This case arose in Rhode Island, while the State was under its colonial charter. As everybody knows, the close of the Revolution found all the States, except Rhode Island, with new constitutions. She continued under the charter granted by Charles II. While the State was under this charter government a question arose as to the validity of an act of the Legislature continuing a portion of the Legislature in office by an act of the Legislature itself. The Legislature, thus continued, elected a gentleman to the Senate, and he came here and claimed his seat. After the next election, the new Legislature declared the former proceedings void and elected another Senator, and he came here and claimed a seat. In that case the matter was thoroughly examined; and now let us see how much consolation out of that report can be drawn by the Senator from Indiana. In the first place, the committee were of opinion that the Legislature, under the charter, had power to continue the term of those senators, and therefore the first election was entirely legal. Now, let us see what the committee say on a point that is material to our discussion:

> There was but one governor and but one senate in the State claiming to be a part of the General Assembly. If there had existed another body of men, however chosen, contending for the offices of the governor and senators in the State, it will not be denied that their respective rights might be the subject of inquiry in deciding a contested election in the Senate of the United States. But in the absence of any such conflicting claims to these offices, where only one legislative body was known in the State, which exercised all the power and performed all the functions of the Legislature, and whose acts have in every form and by every department of the government been declared valid, it would seem to be a palpable invasion of the sovereignty of the State to abrogate its laws, and overthrow its government by denying that a body capable of exercising the powers of legislation existed in the State after the term for which a governor, lieutenant-governor, and senators, chosen at the annual election in April, 1831, had expired.

That was the Rhode Island case.

Mr. MORTON. Does my friend read that as an answer to the statement I made awhile ago?

Mr. CARPENTER. I do.

Mr. MORTON. Seriously?

Mr. CARPENTER. I do, seriously; I might even say, solemnly.

Mr. MORTON. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. CARPENTER. I believe I have the floor at present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The Senator from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. CARPENTER. I will yield to the Senator at any time while I am on the floor, for the legitimate purposes of an interruption. If he wishes to ask a question or to briefly call my attention to a fact, I will yield to him; but I will not yield for the purpose of letting him reply to every paragraph that I utter while I am proceeding. Now the Senator understands whether he is authorized to interrupt me or not.

Mr. MORTON. I simply wish to say that the Senator, a moment ago, contradicted me positively. That remark in that report is made upon the final examination. When Mr. Potter proposed to take his seat, his right was contested upon the ground that the Legislature that elected him was no legislature at all; but the Senate determined that that question must be investigated after he had taken his seat; and it was in the final investigation that the remark now read was made, and in discussing the question, too, whether they were bound by the decisions of the supreme court of Rhode Island. That is all I want to say.

Mr. CARPENTER. The Senator, I trust, did not understand me as attempting to raise a question of veracity.

Mr. MORTON. You raised a question of correctness of statement.

Mr. CARPENTER. Which statement is as to the effect of the report, and that is a matter of opinion on your part and a matter of opinion on mine.

Mr. MORTON. Not much a matter of opinion.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not think it is, either. I think it is absolute certainty, if the Senator will press me to that point. I think it entirely clear that he is wrong; but I only meant to say that he erred in opinion.

Now, what resemblance is there between the Rhode Island case and this case? It does not matter at what point you investigate. The Senator says that case is a great authority for him, because the Senate investigated the case after they seated the Senators. If the Senator from Indiana had moved to seat Mr. Ray when he came here, and this investigation had taken place afterward, that would have been the proper proceeding, but for the fact that he knew, without any investigation, that there was no Legislature to elect. But the Senator did not see fit to pursue that course. He did not ask that Mr. Ray should be seated on his prima facie case; he called for an investigation of the facts, and the committee sat six weeks to ascertain those facts.

Now, what resemblance is there between this case and the case of Robbins? None whatever. In that case the report itself asserts that if there had been two bodies claiming to be the Legislature, it would have been within the power of the Senate to investigate which was the lawful Legislature. The Senator says, you must investigate it after you have seated the Senator on a prima facie case. But here you have investigated the subject before Pinchback presented his credentials. Does the Senator mean to assert that if we proceed to investigate, and ascertain that there is no State government in Louisiana, that as often as a question arises, the decision of which depends upon that fact, and we know that the status remains the same as when we investigated, we cannot act upon our knowledge of that fact but must investigate again, call the same witnesses, take the same testimony, and report it again to this body? The Senator can hardly maintain such a proposition. It makes no difference whether the investigation was made before Mr. Pinchback applied for his seat or is made afterward; his claim must be determined upon the facts, and it is immaterial when those facts came to our knowledge.

A prima facie case is that which appears before an examination of the merits; but when there has been a full investigation and trial, and it is ascertained that what appeared, prima facie, to be the case, is not the true case, then the prima facie case is gone. In Robbins's case there had been no investigation, and therefore the Senate properly acted upon the prima facie case. But here a full investigation had been made before Pinchback presented his prima facie case. Whenever the Senate acts it must act upon all the facts before it; and, in this instance, we have not only the prima facie case made by the credentials, but also the full investigation showing that Pinchback's prima facie case is false. This is the difference between this case and the Robbins case.

Mr. President, with these remarks upon the prima facie case made by Mr. Pinchback's credentials, I come to consider the events which have transpired in the State of Louisiana.

In this part of the case I shall be dry, and, I fear, tedious. It will consist of a mere narration, which can encourage no one, and must depress every lover of his country. But it is my duty to lay before the Senate the facts of the case in all their naked deformity; after which I shall wash my hands of all this business; and if my republican friends, with full knowledge of the case, see fit to take it upon their shoulders through the next political campaign, I can only say I wish them joy.

It is conceded on all hands that on the 1st of November, 1872, Warmoth was governor of the State and Pinchback was lieutenant-governor, he having been elected president pro tempore of the senate and becoming lieutenant-governor on the death of Governor Dunn. The board of canvassers provided for by the State law at that time—I am speaking now of the 1st of November—consisted of the governor, Warmoth; the lieutenant-governor, Pinchback; the secretary of state, if anybody could find out who that was; John Lynch, and T. C. Anderson. On the 4th of November, 1872, there was a general election for electors of President and Vice-President, State officers, half the senate, and the whole house of representatives.

Let us here see what were the provisions of the constitution and laws under which this election was held. The provision of the constitution, found on page 2 of the report of the committee, and the statute, on the third page of the report, are as follows:

> The supreme executive power of the State shall be vested in a chief magistrate, who shall be styled the governor of the State of Louisiana. He shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the lieutenant-governor elected for the same term, be elected as follows: The qualified electors for representatives shall vote for governor and lieutenant-governor at the time and place for voting for representatives; the returns of every election shall be sealed up and transmitted by the proper returning officer to the secretary of state, who shall deliver them to the speaker of the house of representatives on the second day of the session of the General Assembly then to be holden. The members of the General Assembly shall meet in the house of representatives to examine and count the votes. The person having the greatest number of votes for governor shall be declared duly elected; but in case of a tie vote between two or more candidates, one of them shall be immediately chosen governor by joint vote of the members of the General Assembly. The person having the greatest number of votes polled for lieutenant-governor shall be lieutenant-governor; but in case of a tie vote between two or more candidates, one of them shall be immediately chosen lieutenant-governor by joint vote of the members of the General Assembly.—Constitution, title 3, executive department, article 48.

The act of 1870 provides in one section:

> SEC. 54. Be it further enacted, &c., That the governor, the lieutenant-governor, the secretary of state, and John Lynch, and T. C. Anderson, or a majority of them, shall be the returning officers for all elections in the State, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum, and have power to make the returns of all elections. In case of any vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise by either of the board, then the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board of returning officers.

Then on page 5 is section 57, as follows:

> That should any of the returning officers named in this act be a candidate for any office at any election, he shall be disqualified to act as returning officer for that election, and a majority of the remaining returning officers shall summon some respectable citizen to act as returning officer in place of the one so disqualified.

Thus it will be seen that the governor, the lieutenant-governor, the secretary of state, John Lynch, and T. C. Anderson were the returning board. The act which created the returning board was clearly unconstitutional; that is, in conflict with the constitution of the State, which provides that the governor shall appoint all officers. The act itself created the office and filled it. It is as if Congress tomorrow should create a new department of the Government, to be called the department of internal commerce, and provide that John Doe shall be secretary of that department and A B, C D, E F, and so on, shall be clerks and assistants in the department. The act creating that office and filling it in the same breath by two private citizens was as clearly and flagrantly in violation of the constitution as any act can be; but that was the act under which the election was held.

Now, to recapitulate, the board consisted of Warmoth, of Pinchback, of the secretary of state, (there being a dispute as to who was secretary of state,) of John Lynch, and of T. C. Anderson. It was provided by another section that if any one of this board should be a candidate at any election for any office whatever, he should be ineligible to canvass that election. Mr. Pinchback and Mr. Anderson were candidates and were clearly disqualified. So that the board was composed of Warmoth, the secretary of state, and John Lynch.

Here let me call the attention of the Senate to the contest as to who was secretary of state. Warmoth, on the 1st of August, 1871, by what he was pleased to style an "executive order," suspended Mr. Bovee, who had been elected secretary of state at the same time that Warmoth was elected governor, and appointed one Herron in his place. Before Bovee was suspended he had appointed one Wittgenstein assistant secretary of state. After Herron was appointed by the governor he pretended to remove Wittgenstein and appoint one Fairfax. Of course this executive order of Governor Warmoth was just as efficacious for any legal purpose as an executive order issued by the editor of the New Orleans Republican removing Warmoth would have been. It did not remove Bovee; it was utterly void. The governor had no more authority to issue it than a private citizen had, but still he did issue it, and Herron went into office and Bovee went out, and Herron removed Wittgenstein and appointed Fairfax, and Herron and Fairfax were in the offices, that is, they were in the rooms, in possession of the papers, the seal of the State, and the documents and records of the office, when this election took place, on the 4th of November, 1872. So that Herron had good hope that he was the secretary of state designated by the act to serve in the board of canvassers.

The law requires that within ten days after the election the board shall meet to canvass the returns. On the 13th of November the board met. It was evident from the first meeting that there was a good time coming, and desiring not to hasten it unnecessarily, they adjourned without doing anything until the 14th. On the 14th Warmoth seems to have been convinced that he could not control Herron in the canvassing board, and that Herron having the casting vote between him and Lynch would organize that board with men unfriendly to his purposes. The board had adjourned to twelve o'clock of the 14th; but on the morning of the 14th Warmoth put forth another "executive order," removing Herron and appointing one Wharton to take his place; and Wharton appeared and claimed his seat as a member of the board of canvassers. Then the board consisted of Warmoth and Lynch, undoubted members under the law, Herron or Wharton, if anybody could determine which, and two vacancies; and it was the duty of the board to fill those vacancies. They proceeded to perform that duty. Warmoth and Wharton voted for Hatch and Da Ponte; Lynch and Herron voted for Longstreet and Hawkins.

Now it is manifest that only one of these persons, either Herron or Wharton, was entitled to act, because both of them were not secretary of state; but as it was uncertain which was, they both voted; Warmoth and Wharton voting for Hatch and Da Ponte, and Lynch and Herron voting for Longstreet and Hawkins.

After this there were two boards: one consisting of Warmoth, an undoubted member, Wharton, Hatch, Da Ponte, and Lynch, (always absent;) and the other board consisting of Warmoth, (always absent,) Lynch, Longstreet, Hawkins, and Herron and Bovee, serving by turns. These, then, were the two boards resulting from the attempt to fill the vacancies in the board.

If we could ascertain here whether Herron or Wharton was secretary of state at the time of this filling of vacancies, we could then determine whether Hatch and Da Ponte, or Longstreet and Hawkins, were duly elected. It turns out in point of fact that neither Herron nor Wharton was secretary of state; neither of them had a right to vote at all, as I will show you; and therefore the attempted election resulted as follows: Warmoth, entitled to vote, voting for Hatch and Da Ponte; Lynch, entitled to vote, voting for Longstreet and Hawkins, and therefore there was no election. Let us see if this is the true state of the case.

I have already reminded the Senate that Herron, who had been appointed by Warmoth after the removal of Bovee, removed Wittgenstein and appointed Fairfax assistant secretary of state. Wittgenstein and Fairfax commenced litigating to determine which of them was assistant secretary of state. That case went to the supreme court, and let me call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the case was decided by the supreme court of Louisiana before any contest arose as to the election of 1872.

The Senator from Indiana has dilated much upon our duty to bow to the decisions of the supreme court of Louisiana in determining a question of which the Constitution of the United States says we shall be the exclusive judges. And if we are to bow to the decisions of that State court, I want to show the Senate that the decisions which were made when the judicial mind was impartial, made before temptation had overwhelmed the judges, made before political necessities had undermined their integrity, were all in favor of the line of argument which I am pursuing.

In this suit of Joseph Wittgenstein vs. F. J. Herron and J. W. Fairfax, to be found in volume 24 Louisiana Annual Reports, pages 432, 433, the court held as follows:

It was not necessary in the action of the relator in seeking his rights to incorporate a proceeding against Herron to have him decreed to be an intruder. There was an unnecessary and improper joinder of parties. Eliminating, therefore, from the action the extraneous portion of it, we shall proceed to an examination of the issue between Wittgenstein and Fairfax in regard to the office of assistant secretary of state. The governor suspended the secretary of state from the exercise of his functions as a state officer. No vacancy in the office of secretary of state thereby arose.

The governor suspended Bovee as secretary of state, but no vacancy in the office of secretary of state was thereby created.

The governor is without power to appoint a secretary of state unless a vacancy occur in the office, and then only ad interim as provided by the constitution.

Conceding—

And I want to call my friend's attention particularly to this. This is high authority. This is the supreme court of Louisiana while it was a court:

Conceding that in case of the suspension of a secretary of state from the performance of the duties of the office, the governor would have, on general principles, the right to appoint a person to discharge the duties of secretary of state—upon which we express no opinion—the person so appointed would be clothed only with ministerial duties, such as arise in the usual routine of office business. The secretary of state is vested by law with the power to appoint an assistant secretary of state. This is not a mere ministerial duty. The person charged with the performance of the ministerial duties of the secretary of state during his suspension from office is without power to remove from office, and much less without the power to appoint to office an assistant secretary, for the reason that he himself is not secretary of state.

That court before it was tampered with, that court while it entertained no fear of its existence, decided what every other court would decide, that a void order produces no legal result; that as the governor had no authority to remove Bovee, Bovee had not been removed; as he had no authority to appoint a secretary of state except in case of a vacancy, and Bovee had not been removed, there was no vacancy, and the appointment of Herron was a nullity. They say that conceding which they do not decide, but even conceding that when the governor had done such an extraordinary thing as to suspend an officer over whom he had no control, he might appoint another to discharge the duties of the office ad interim, yet such appointee could only discharge the mere routine duties of the office, and that he could not appoint an assistant secretary of state for the reason that he was not secretary of state himself. This decision was made in May, 1872, six months before the election.

There is another decision in the same volume on page 19, establishing the same principle—the case of Edmondson vs. McNeely. In this case the court say:

The relator, M. D. Edmondson, proceeding under the intrusion act, complains that the defendant has intruded into the office of parish judge of the parish of Sabine, which office belongs to the relator by virtue of his election at the November election of 1870, and to which he was duly commissioned and qualified.

Then they state other facts, and add:

There is no doubt that the relator, M. D. Edmondson, is the lawful incumbent of the office in question. He was duly elected and qualified, receiving his commission from the governor, dated 31st December, 1870.

It is not pretended that he has resigned or has been removed by address or impeachment. It appears as a matter of fact that the commission to the defendant was issued by the governor in error, the governor having been led to suppose that the plaintiff had left the State permanently and thus abandoned his office.

It is well settled that a constitutional officer cannot be destituted of his office except in the manner provided in the constitution, and that the appointment to an office not vacant gives no title thereto.

There, Mr. President, are two clear adjudications of the supreme court of Louisiana, when everything was tranquil, when no election was pending, when no canvass was proceeding, when no rival candidates were struggling for the State offices, settling principles which show clearly and conclusively that Herron never was secretary of state, and that he therefore had no right to act in the canvassing board, that not being one of the routine duties of the office; and of course he had no right to vote in the board to elect the vacant members of that board. He could no more vote to fill those vacancies than he could appoint an assistant secretary of state, and for the same reason, because, as the court say, he was not secretary of state himself.

Then it follows, Mr. President, by necessary logical conclusion, that the vacancies existing in the canvassing board on the 14th day of November were never filled. There were on the 14th of November but two legal members of the board; one was Warmoth, the governor, the other was Lynch. Warmoth voted for Hatch and Da Ponte, and Lynch voted for Longstreet and Hawkins, and of course no election was effected. Warmoth and Lynch never met officially afterward. Warmoth, at the election to fill the vacancies, treated Wharton as secretary of state, counted his vote with his own, and declared that Hatch and Da Ponte were elected, and the four withdrew, inviting Mr. Lynch, but Mr. Lynch went not. Mr. Lynch, considering Herron secretary of state, thought Herron's vote should be counted with his own, and they withdrew with Longstreet and Hawkins, and constituted the Lynch board, recognizing Warmoth as a member, but he refusing to act with them.

But in the light of these decisions of the supreme court it is as clear as any proposition can be made by adjudication that Herron had no right to vote in that board; that the only men who had a right to vote were Warmoth and Lynch, and that they voted in opposite ways, and no election whatever resulted; and from that day those two boards never met; from that day Warmoth and Lynch never met; from that day there never was but one man who was a legal officer under the election law who pretended to sit in any board that pretended to be a canvassing board.

Mr. WEST. Who was that?

Mr. CARPENTER. That legal officer was Warmoth in one board, and Lynch in the other.

Mr. WEST. You said "one."

Mr. CARPENTER. I say but one officer in each board. Nobody will claim that Warmoth sitting in one building, and Lynch sitting in another, made a legal board. They must meet as a board; the legal members of the board must meet in order to have the power which the act conferred on the board. Such a meeting never took place; and if the decisions made by this court in May, 1872, are to be considered as settling the law, then Herron never was secretary of state, and never had a right to vote for any man to fill those vacancies, and his vote was therefore void, and the vacancies never were filled.

The fact is that Bovee was secretary of state all the time; but if the fact had been known it would not have obviated the difficulty, because Bovee was himself a candidate, and therefore ineligible to serve. There would still have been but two legal members of the board, and three vacancies.

If I am wrong in this the supreme court decisions made before this controversy arose are to be ignored utterly, and all sound reasoning is to be disregarded on the subject, for I maintain that those decisions are the undoubted law and what any court would hold. And in the light of these decisions it is clear that the canvass of votes by the Lynch board was absolutely void.

But it is worth while to see how this Lynch board proceeded. The Senator from Indiana, when pressed upon this matter, will have to rely upon the proceedings of this board. He has done so in the former discussions of this case, and he will now. Conceding now the Lynch board to have been legal, although we know it was not, let us see what was done by it. The returns as they came up from the election under the law were sent to Governor Warmoth, and the law made it his duty to lay them before the canvassing board; and immediately afterward, this difficulty having arisen, the Lynch board, so called, obtained an injunction against Governor Warmoth, restraining him from canvassing those returns except in their board; and the Warmoth board obeyed this injunction and made no canvass.

This much is to be said in favor of the Warmoth board, that being enjoined, it stopped; but the Lynch board, although equally enjoined, proceeded to make a canvass, in open contempt of the injunction; and yet it is admitted it never had a return before it to canvass.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator omits one fact there.

Mr. CARPENTER. What is it?

Mr. MORTON. Governor Warmoth opened the returns in his private office.

Mr. CARPENTER. Yes; the testimony shows that Governor Warmoth opened these returns in his own office, but they were not laid before his board with a view to be canvassed, and they were never laid before the Lynch board at all.

Now let me call attention to the contest which sprang up between these two boards. I ask the Clerk to read from page 8 of the report which I send to him.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

These boards, for convenience of designation, will hereafter be called the Warmoth board and the Lynch board.

Each of these boards appealed to the court. The Lynch board, about November 18, 1872, commenced suit against the Warmoth board in the eighth district court of New Orleans, Dibble, J., presiding. About the same time the Warmoth board commenced suit against the Lynch board, in the same court, and before the same judge. Dibble granted an injunction in both cases, enjoining both boards. In connection with this extraordinary proceeding of injunction against injunction, it should be borne in mind that Dibble was a judge holding over until his successor should be commissioned, and was therefore directly interested in restraining any canvass of votes which must determine that his opponent (Elmore) was duly elected and entitled to his (Dibble's) seat; and that he would continue in office as long as the injunctions granted by him should prevent a legal determination that his opponent (Elmore) had been elected in his place. That Elmore had, in fact, been elected over Dibble, two to one, is admitted by all parties in this controversy.

About the 19th of November Dibble decided the suit commenced by the Lynch board in their favor, and enjoined the Warmoth board, and on the same day dismissed the suit in favor of the Warmoth board against the Lynch board.

Thereupon Governor Warmoth took from his safe a bill which had been passed by the Legislature in the previous spring, but never approved by him so as to become a law, and on the 20th of November, 1872, gave it his approval.

This act, approved November 20, 1872, among other things, provides as follows:

"SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, &c., That five persons, to be elected by the senate, from all political parties, shall be the returning officers for all elections in the State, a majority of whom shall constitute a quorum, and have power to make the returns of all elections. In case of any vacancy by death, resignation, or otherwise, by either of the board, then the vacancy shall be filled by the residue of the board of returning officers. The returning officers shall, after each election, before entering on their duties, take and subscribe to the following oath, before a judge of the supreme or any district court:

"I, A B, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully and diligently perform the duties of a returning officer as prescribed by law; that I will carefully and honestly canvass and compile the statements of the votes, and make a true and correct return of the election: So help me God.

"Within ten days after the closing of the election said returning officers shall meet in New Orleans to canvass and compile the statement of votes made by the commissioners of election, and make returns of the election to the secretary of state. They shall continue in session until such returns have been compiled. The presiding officer shall, at such meeting, open, in the presence of the said returning officers, the statements of the commissioners of election, and the said returning officers shall, from said statements, canvass and compile the returns of the election in duplicate; one copy of such returns they shall file in the office of the secretary of state, and of one copy they shall make public proclamation, by printing in the official journal and such other newspapers as they may deem proper, declaring the names of all persons and officers voted for, the number of votes for each person, and the names of the persons who have been duly and lawfully elected. The return of the election thus made and promulgated shall be prima facie evidence in all courts of justice and before all civil officers, until set aside after contest according to law, of the right of any person named therein to hold and exercise the office to which he shall by such return be declared elected. The governor shall, within thirty days thereafter, issue commissions to all officers thus declared elected who are required by law to be commissioned."

And further, as follows:

"SEC. 71. Be it further enacted, &c., That this act shall take effect from and after its passage, and that all others on the subject of election laws be, and the same are hereby, repealed."

Governor Warmoth claimed that the effect of this act was to abolish all previously existing canvassing or returning boards; and that, inasmuch as the act took effect during the vacation of the Legislature, he was authorized to appoint the board under that provision of the constitution before quoted, which authorizes the governor to fill vacancies occurring during such vacation.

On the same day upon which the governor approved the last-named act he issued a proclamation, calling a session of the Legislature, to convene on the 9th day of December, 1872. It is admitted on all hands that the members of the Legislature elected November 4, 1872, if any were elected, were authorized to convene under this proclamation.

On the 21st of November motion was made before Judge Dibble for a new trial in the suit of the Lynch board against the Warmoth board, in which the judge had decided in favor of the Lynch board, enjoining the Warmoth board, and in the suit in favor of the Warmoth board against the Lynch board, which that judge had dismissed; and these motions were set down for hearing before Judge Dibble on the 25th of November. Before this day arrived Governor Warmoth, pretending to be convinced that Elmore had been elected in place of Dibble, commissioned Elmore, who, supported by the sheriff and a posse comitatus of roughs and thugs, took his place on the bench, and excluded Dibble. It should be stated, however, in this connection, that although no legal canvass had been made ascertaining the fact that Elmore was elected, nevertheless it is admitted by all parties that he was, in fact, elected by about 9,000 majority.

On the 3d of December, Elmore, who had been commissioned as aforesaid, and was seated on the bench, substantially by force, granted the motion for new trial in both cases, upon the ground that the act approved November 20 had abolished all former boards; and he dissolved the injunction granted against the Warmoth board, and dismissed both suits.

Governor Warmoth, having thus, by the judgment of a judge by him prematurely commissioned, rid himself of the embarrassment arising from the two boards of canvassers pretending to act, on the evening of the 3d of December proceeded to fill the board provided for by the act of November 20, by appointing De Feriet, Wiltz, Isabelle, Austin, and Taylor, in pretended pursuance of the authority conferred upon him by article 61 of the constitution, to fill vacancies happening in the vacation of the Legislature.

Mr. CARPENTER. I have requested the reading of this extract from the report to give a brief history of the contest which took place between these two boards. I now want to show how the Lynch board proceeded; and I will ask the Clerk to read, from page 51 of the evidence, section 29 of the election law of 1870, under which this election was held.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 29. Be it further enacted, &c., That in any parish, precinct, ward, city, or town, in which during the time of registration or revision of registration, or on any day of election, there shall be any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, at any place within said parish, or at or near any poll or voting place or places of registration or revision of registration, which riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences shall prevent, or tend to prevent, a fair, free, peaceable, and full vote of all the qualified electors of said parish, precinct, ward, city, or town, it shall be the duty of the commissioners of election, if such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences occur on the day of election, or of the supervisor of registration, or any assistant supervisor of registration of the parish, if they occur during the time of registration or revision of registration, to make in duplicate, and under oath, a clear and full statement of all the facts relating thereto, and of the effect produced by such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, in preventing a fair, free, peaceable, and full registration or election, and of the number of qualified electors deterred by such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, from registering or voting, which statement shall also be corroborated under oath by three respectable citizens, qualified electors of the parish.

Mr. CARPENTER. Now turn to pages 57 and 58 and read section 55 of the same act, for the purpose of showing what was the jurisdiction of a canvassing board under that act.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 55. Be it further enacted, &c., That in such canvass and compilation the returning officers shall observe the following order: They shall compile first the statements from all polls or voting places at which there shall have been a fair, free, and peaceable registration and election. Whenever from any poll or voting place there shall be received the statement of any supervisor of registration, assistant supervisor of registration, or commissioner of election, in form as required by section 29 of this act, on affidavit of three or more citizens, of any riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences, which prevented or tended to prevent a fair, free, and peaceable and full vote of all qualified electors entitled to vote at such poll or voting place, such returning officers shall not canvass, count, or compile the statement of votes from such poll or voting place until the statements from all other polls or voting places shall have been canvassed and compiled. The returning officers shall then proceed to investigate the statements of riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences at any such poll or voting place, and if from the evidence of such statements they shall be convinced that such riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did not materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting place, or did not prevent a sufficient number of qualified voters thereat from registering or voting to materially change the result of the election, then, and not otherwise, said returning officers shall canvass and compile the vote of such poll or voting place with those previously canvassed and compiled; but if said returning officers shall not be fully satisfied thereof, it shall be their duty to examine further testimony in regard thereto, and to this end they shall have power to send for persons and papers. If after such examination the said returning officers shall be convinced that said riot, tumult, acts of violence, intimidation, armed disturbance, bribery, or corrupt influences did materially interfere with the purity and freedom of the election at such poll or voting place, or did prevent a sufficient number of the qualified electors thereat from registering and voting to materially change the result of the election, then the said returning officers shall not canvass or compile the statement of the votes of such poll or voting place, but shall exclude it from their returns.

Mr. CARPENTER. Thus it will be seen, Mr. President, that the duty of the canvassers is entirely ministerial. Their entire duty is to take the statements and returns sent up from the polls and compile them, aggregate them, and state the result, except there shall come from some polls a certificate from the commissioner that there was riot or fraud or bribery in such degree as materially to affect the result of the election. Then, their duty is to canvass all the unquestioned polls first. Then, take up these disputed cases, and their jurisdiction to inquire into the subject is based entirely upon the statement from the commissioner that there has been riot, fraud, or bribery, which has materially affected the result. They shall take, in the first place, the statement, and if they are satisfied from that, they may decide without further evidence. If not, they may send for persons and papers and determine whether there has been such riot, fraud, bribery, &c., at the polls. If they find that there has been, and are still of the opinion that it did not materially affect the result of the election, they are to canvass the return just as the return is; but if on the investigation they are satisfied that the riot, bribery, fraud, &c., did materially affect the result, then they are to reject that poll entirely; so that the only jurisdiction they have is based upon this report from the poll of fraud, riot, &c., and the only thing they can do after they have made the investigation is either to count the return or reject it in toto.

I may say here in passing that in point of fact not a single statement showing any riot, or fraud, or bribery accompanied a single return. Therefore, if the proper canvassing board had had the proper legal returns before them, they would have had no jurisdiction whatever to call a witness or inquire into the fact of the election at a single poll.

I wish in this connection to refer to the case of Bashford vs. Barstow, (4 Wisconsin, 798;) and I will ask the Clerk to read the passages I have marked. I may say that the statute of Wisconsin, so far as this question is concerned, is almost identical with this Louisiana election law of 1870. It requires the canvassers to make their statements from the returns made to them, and the acts are for all material purposes identical. In the case to which I refer the canvassers did receive what were called supplemental returns; that is, they received statements made by the officers at a day later than the regular return, and then they received some affidavits showing that irregularities took place, and all that without any authority from the law. The extract which I ask the Clerk to read will show how that matter was disposed of when the election came in contest before the supreme court of Wisconsin.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

"SEC. 73. The board, when thus formed, shall, upon the certified statements of elections made by the boards of county canvassers, proceed to examine and make a statement of the whole number of votes given at any such election for the offices of governor and lieutenant-governor, secretary of state, treasurer, attorney-general, and State superintendent, or either of them; and another statement of the votes given for Representative in Congress in each congressional district; each of which statements shall show the name of the persons to whom such votes shall have been given for either of the said offices, and the whole number of votes given to each, distinguishing the several districts and counties in which they were given.

"SEC. 74. They shall certify such statements to be correct, and subscribe their names thereto, and they shall thereupon determine what persons have been by the greatest number of votes duly elected to such offices or either of them, and shall make and subscribe on each statement a certificate of such determination, and deliver the same to the secretary of state.

"SEC. 95. Whenever it shall satisfactorily appear that any person has received a plurality of the legal votes at any election, for any office, the canvassers shall give to such person a certificate of election, notwithstanding the provisions of law may not have been fully complied with in noticing or conducting the election, or canvassing or returning the votes, so that the real will of the plurality may not be defeated by any informality."

It will be observed that according to the seventy-third and seventy-fourth sections above quoted the board are, upon the certified statements of elections made by the boards of county canvassers, to make a statement of the whole number of votes given for State officers, which shall show the names of the persons to whom such votes shall have been given, &c., and that thereupon they shall determine what persons have been, by the greatest number of votes, duly elected.

It is clear from these sections of the statute that the State canvassers are to make their statement and determination from the certified statements of the county canvassers alone. All other testimony is excluded from their consideration. The statute is too positive and explicit upon this subject to admit of any doubt. No language could have been used in the statute which would have expressed more clearly the intention of the Legislature to confine the State canvassers to the statements of the county canvassers than that contained in these sections.

But it was contended by the counsel for the respondent, in an argument submitted to the court on a former occasion, that section 95, above quoted, gave almost unlimited discretion to the State canvassers, and enabled them to receive other testimony as to the number of votes given in the several counties for a State office, and to determine from such testimony that a person had received a plurality of the votes, although such a result might not be established by the statements of the county canvassers. We cannot assent to this construction of the provision of the statute in question. This section provides that whenever it shall satisfactorily appear that any person has received a plurality of legal votes, &c. How is this fact satisfactorily to appear? Manifestly by the statements made by the county canvassers. There is no intimation in this section that any other testimony is to be resorted to by the State canvassers for the purpose of determining the question submitted to them than that which the statute prescribes, namely, the statements of the county canvassers. To allow the construction of the statute contended for to prevail would be to dispense with the necessity of a statement of votes by the county canvassers in all cases, and to permit the State canvassers to substitute any proof which they might choose to hear.

This section of the statute further provides that the canvassers shall give to the person who has received a plurality of legal votes a certificate of election, notwithstanding the provisions of law may not have been fully complied with in noticing and conducting the election, or canvassing or returning the votes, &c.

We think that this provision does not authorize the canvassers to hear other testimony than such as the statute prescribes. It gives the canvassers power to decide that a person who has received a plurality of the votes shall receive a certificate of election, although the statements which show this fact may not be in all respects in strict conformity with the statute. But it by no means gives the canvassers power to consider statements of votes made by other persons than those who by law are authorized to make them, nor by those persons, unless the statements themselves are authorized by the statute. It appears to us that this must be the correct exposition of this section of the statute, for the reason that unauthorized statements of votes made by inspectors of town elections and by county canvassers, upon general principles of law, cannot be evidence for any purpose. It is only when these officers are authorized to make these statements that any effect can be given to them.—4 Wisconsin Reports, pages 398–800.

Mr. CARPENTER. Mr. President, I have referred to this decision because, as I remarked before, the statutes in the two cases are for all material purposes identical. In Wisconsin there is a little more machinery about it, but the State canvassing board have to canvass from the statements sent to them by the county boards; in Louisiana the State canvassing board have to canvass statements sent up from the polls; but the language of both laws is the same in substance in defining the duty of the State canvassing board. They are to canvass from the statements sent to them, and not otherwise; and in that case the court held, that under no circumstances could the canvassing board go outside of those statements, or take any other testimony, or take any supplementary returns, from the returning officers.

It has been claimed for this board that inasmuch as they were the legal board, but did not have the legal returns, they must canvass something; and if they had not the legal returns to canvass, they must canvass in some other way; and if they had not the returns before them, they might take parol proof. I doubt very much whether, under any circumstances, that board of canvassers would be authorized to take secondary evidence of the contents of the returns. I do not assert that they could not; but I doubt it. A court of general jurisdiction, when an instrument or paper which would be evidence has been lost or destroyed or is withheld, may, after proper foundation laid, receive parol proof to establish the contents of the writing; but I doubt whether this board would have any such authority. I am of opinion that if these returns had all been collected in the state-house and destroyed by fire, under that law the canvassers could have done nothing.

But passing that, concede that they might have taken parol proof; how far could they go? Manifestly no further than to ascertain the contents of the returns. If, for instance, the returns had been destroyed by fire, or, as the case was, were withheld by Warmoth, what parol proof could they take? If they could do anything, they could call witnesses to prove the contents of the returns, and having established by parol what the returns were, then they could canvass the returns by parol proof established. It is evident that such a power would be very dangerous. To provide that a canvassing board, if the returns were destroyed or lost, might go back to the fact of the election, and establish its results by parol proof, would be offering an inducement to destroy the returns in all cases of closely contested elections. So that all that could have been done in any event by this board was to take parol proof of the contents of those returns, and so having ascertained their contents, count them and make return accordingly.

But what did this board do? They resolved themselves into a general committee of investigation. They had no authority as a canvassing board to inquire as to the vote at any of the polling places, because there was no accompanying statement from the commissioner that there had been fraud or riot which had disturbed the election. They had no jurisdiction of that kind; they had no returns before them to canvass. What did they do? They resolved that they would go away from the returns back to the fact, and ascertain how this election resulted. They went on, and, as this testimony shows—and after a brief statement of it I shall have the testimony read, so that I may not misstate it at all—they went on in some cases and obtained from the United States officers the duplicate statements which they kept under the act of Congress. The State canvassers had no more authority to take them than they had to take an affidavit signed by a private person. They took those where they could. Where they could not get them, they took newspaper reports of what the result was at different polls. Where they could not get those, they resorted to forged affidavits; and one pleasant little gentleman swears, with a smiling face, that he himself forged twelve hundred affidavits in one day and delivered them to Mr. Bovee, sitting in the board, and Bovee said he was "a hell of a fellow," and asked if he could not get more of the same kind; and he said he could get three or four hundred more of the same kind by nine o'clock the next morning, if necessary. [Laughter.] Then, not satisfied with the duplicate returns, not satisfied with the newspaper accounts, not satisfied with forged affidavits, and after all these valuable means of information failed, the board themselves swear that they made an estimate based upon their knowledge of the political complexion of the country as to what the vote ought to have been if it had been fair, and counted it accordingly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And so estimated it?

Mr. CARPENTER. And so estimated it in one parish, giving Mr. Kellogg so many votes, and so on. Now, to illustrate, take the parish of Bossier. There was no statement of riot to give any jurisdiction to inquire into the fact. If any such statement had existed, all that the board could do was either to count or reject the return. They were first to ascertain whether there was any riot, and then to inquire whether it materially affected the result. If it did not amount to much, then they were to count the returns just as they did all the others. If they thought it did materially affect the result, then they were to reject it altogether, and canvass the rest. They must either count it as it came or reject it entirely. They were to ascertain, on the question of fact, whether the result had been materially affected by the riot. If it had been, then they were to reject it altogether and count nothing from that poll; if it had not materially affected the result, although there had been a riot or had been bribery, they were to count it. In other words, it was a general equitable jurisdiction, to do, as they say up in New England, about what is right.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They could not take a part and reject a part?

Mr. CARPENTER. They could not take a part and reject a part. It was all to be counted, or nothing to be counted. In the first place, they had no jurisdiction to inquire; and, in the second place, if they had jurisdiction, they must either count or reject the return; but in this parish of Bossier they did neither the one nor the other. The returns showed that Mr. McEnery had 953 votes and Kellogg 555. If they had found the riot, &c., then they would have excluded that poll, and neither McEnery nor Kellogg would have had a vote from it; but, nevertheless, by their ciphering they gave Kellogg, 1,159 votes; they gave Antoine, the candidate for lieutenant-governor, 1,159 votes; they gave Deslonde 1,159 votes; they gave Clinton 1,159 votes; they gave Field 1,159 votes; they gave Brown 1,159 votes. They gave McEnery nothing, Penn nothing, Armstead nothing, Graham nothing, Ogden nothing, Lusher nothing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do you say that is a fact found by the committee in the form of a report, or appearing in the evidence there?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly. The returns themselves show that McEnery had 953 votes in that parish. He did not get a vote in this return. The returns show that Kellogg had 555 votes; he gets 1,159. How much more satisfactory than an election that is!

Take the parish of Natchitoches. The returns show that McEnery had 1,250 votes; Penn, 1,252; Armstead, 1,243; Ogden, 1,252; Graham, 1,252; Lusher, 1,251; Kellogg, 550; Antoine, 548; Deslonde, 549; Field, 549; Clinton, 548; Brown, 549. This board gave Kellogg 1,206 instead of 550. They gave Antoine 1,206; Deslonde, 1,206; Clinton, 1,206; Field, 1,206; Brown, 1,206; McEnery, nothing; Penn, nothing; Armstead, nothing; Ogden, nothing; Graham, nothing; Lusher, nothing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Did they profess to be acting under the statute which you have just read?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly; but made slight deviations where the republican ticket required the deviations, as they testify themselves. In reading over these returns, finding that every republican candidate got precisely the same vote, and that every democratic candidate got precisely the same, which is nothing at all, I am forcibly reminded of an anecdote I heard about the proceedings in a court out in Indiana. A powerful old Hoosier was called up and indicted for stealing hogs, and to avoid the danger of variance the pleader had charged that on a certain day, feloniously, &c., &c., the defendant took and carried away two hogs, two pigs, two boars, two sows, two barrows, and two of every kind of hog that he had ever heard of. When the indictment was read through to the Hoosier, he looked up to the court and said, "Why, your honor, there never was such an evenly divided gang of hogs on earth; the indictment must be void." Laughter.]

We all know the contingencies that ordinarily attend an election. Take the case of this man Armstead, who was a colored man, who was a preacher, who was a popular man among his own race, who had at all events a great many friends all around; and when you see that he did not get even a vote, and that the other side were raised from 550 up to 1,206, then ask anybody to believe that there was anything done honestly by that board.

In the two parishes to which I have just referred McEnery had 2,203 and Kellogg 1,105 votes; that is to say, in the two parishes McEnery's majority, as shown by the returns, is 1,098, and they gave Kellogg in those two parishes 2,365, and McEnery not a vote; that is to say, in those two parishes they changed the result 3,463 votes!

Now, Mr. President, for the purpose of showing that I have not been railing at these men, I propose to have their own testimony read. Bovee came back into this canvassing board after the proceedings had gone on for a time, and took his seat as secretary of state, after the supreme court decided that he was secretary of state. He was ineligible to a seat in that board because he was a candidate at the election; but Bovee was not going to be stopped by a little difficulty of that kind. Mere ineligibility to act in a board where neither of them had the slightest right to act at all, where they had nothing to act upon, where they were under injunction restraining them from acting at all—a little question of the ineligibility of a man certainly was not entitled to much consideration, and Bovee acted. Now let us read his testimony, and the testimony of some of the other members of this board, for the purpose of showing what they did. I will ask the Clerk to read the passages I have marked on pages 484 and 485.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

A. Saint Helena is a very close parish. In 1870 it gave 30 democratic majority. It is considered a very close parish. We made our returns upon affidavits.
Q. That is, the Federal supervisors and their returns?
A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. WARMOTH:

Q. You say it is a very close parish?
A. Very close, indeed.
Q. How many candidates ran for the Legislature there?
A. I do not know. It is a very close parish.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You said you had the affidavits of the Federal supervisor upon what? Did you have these affidavits of the Federal supervisors of the national Government? I do not like to use that word "Federal" too much.
A. Affidavits of the supervisors of election.
Q. What did they show?
A. They showed a very doubtful case. I think just as likely one was elected as another.

Mr. CARPENTER. I call the attention of the Senate to that remark of Bovee, that he thinks one was just as likely elected as the other.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

Q. Did they show fraud?
A. Not particularly.

By Mr. CARPENTER:

Q. What did you decide about it?
A. To give that to the republicans.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You gave them the benefit of the doubt?
A. We were determined to have a legislature.

By Mr. MCMILLEN:

Q. In these very doubtful districts, the evidences of fraud were not so patent?
A. No, sir; they were not in these particular instances.

By Mr. CARPENTER:

Q. Do you mean it was very doubtful whether there had been any frauds there or not?
A. I have no recollection about that. There were some reports, but to no great extent.
Q. Some unpleasant rumors?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And it being close, you put the republican in?
A. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARPENTER. In that very parish in which Bovee swears that one was just as likely elected as the other, the returns show that Davis, the republican candidate, had 276 votes, and Gorman, the democrat, 708. This canvassing board reversed the thing and gave Davis 543 and Gorman 439, giving Davis, the republican, a majority of 4; and yet Bovee says that one was just as likely to be elected as the other!

Now I call attention to the testimony of Mr. Lynch, who, I believe, stands so fair in all these proceedings in New Orleans that I am told he is affectionately called "Honest John Lynch;" and if that be a fact, after we have heard his testimony in regard to this canvass, we shall be pretty well enabled to judge of the general standard of honesty in official proceedings in New Orleans. I ask the Clerk to read from pages 155 and 156.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Answer. * * * I would like to make a statement, with the permission of the committee, of the general principle that controlled me in my action as a member of the board.
Q. Go on and state it.
A. We had not the technical evidence before us. We were what I considered in the midst of a revolution, and in order to get at the result of the election as near as we could, as an officer acting, I availed myself of every kind of information within my reach, not only the affidavits, but my former knowledge of the political divisions of the inhabitants of the State as corroborative of the evidence placed before us. I do not pretend to say that the results we arrived at in all cases were technically correct, but I believe we were substantially correct as to the result, and that it was the best we could do under the circumstances. It was the best under the circumstances we could do in our efforts to arrive at the truth.
Q. How many affidavits altogether were counted from different parishes as votes?
A. I could not enumerate the whole number. I have not them in my memory. I remember particular parishes. In Natchitoches there were 1,206.

Mr. CARPENTER. Let me call attention to one fact at that point. Under the law, as I have already shown, they could only count the return or reject the return entirely. Instead of that, they set the return aside, and then proceeded to count affidavits, of what? Of the number of votes cast? O, no; but the affidavits of men who swear that they would have voted the republican ticket, but were deprived of the right to vote. So that upon that theory the only way a man could be sure of his vote in that parish, was to keep it in his pocket. If he put it in the box, somebody might steal it, and he would have no remedy; but if he kept it in his pocket, after the election he could file an affidavit, and then they would count the affidavit as though the vote had been cast. All these affidavits that he is speaking about are affidavits of men who swear that they did not vote, and yet each affidavit is counted as a vote in Mr. Kellogg's majority.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading, as follows:

Q. In this parish, in which you say the regular vote was rejected and you counted only those that made affidavits that they had not voted, or had been denied the right to vote, how many were there?
A. That was Bossier, 1,159.
Q. Was that the whole number of votes returned by you from that parish?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Were they all for one ticket?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Were there any other parishes in which the regular vote was thrown out?
A. Yes, sir; Natchitoches.
Q. Was the whole of the regular vote thrown out there?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And you acted upon affidavits?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How many?
A. One thousand two hundred and six.
Q. For what tickets were those affidavits?
A. All republican.
Q. Then is your statement distinct that there were no votes counted in that parish except upon affidavits?
A. None by us.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is, every vote that was counted in that parish was upon the affidavit of a man who said he had not voted.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading, as follows:

Q. Were there any other parishes in the same way, that were thrown out entirely?
A. I do not at this moment recollect any.
Q. How many votes were thrown out in the first parish you named? How many did you reject?
A. I do not know that; we rejected the whole thing.
Q. State how many that was as near as you can tell.
A. I cannot tell.
Q. Was it 100, or 1,000, or 2,000?
A. I cannot tell.

By Mr. CARPENTER:

Q. Will those returns be here showing that precisely?
A. Yes, sir; we rejected the whole parish on the ground that we believed it to have been an organized fraud, and that we could not have determined who the votes were cast for, nor what was the intention of the voters.
Q. Did you throw out the regular vote in any other parishes except in those two?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Did you throw out the vote in the whole parish in any other case?
A. No, sir; I do not remember of any other whole parish now.
Q. There was no other parish that you threw out in full.
A. None.
Q. You threw out a part of the vote in other parishes?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Can you name the parish?
A. Yes, sir; we threw out some in the parish of Orleans, which the minutes of the board will show. I cannot state them accurately.
Q. Do you know the number of the poll, or can you designate the vote thrown out?
A. I cannot tell from memory; the minutes will show.

Mr. CARPENTER. Now I ask the Clerk to read from the testimony of Mr. Lynch, on pages 157 and 158.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. CARPENTER:

Question. What do you mean by saying you set aside a part of a poll in some cases?
Answer. Not a part of a poll. In a case where the irregularities presented were such, we threw out the whole poll.
Q. I think I understand you.
A. Then here are affidavits presented by parties that were prevented from depositing their ballots at all. In that case we counted them.

Mr. CARPENTER. That, is they rejected the whole of the return, and then they counted the affidavits of men who swore that they had not voted.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading, as follows:

Q. In some cases you threw out a part of a poll?
A. No, sir.

By the CHAIRMAN:

Q. You mean you threw out the vote of some parishes.
A. Some parishes were thrown out completely, and in some cases polls only.
Q. Entire polls?
A. Yes, sir; entire polls.
Q. I will ask whether in any case where the vote was thrown out you would make any estimate of what the vote fairly was in that poll and count it.
A. No, sir.
Q. You would actually count votes upon affidavits.
A. Upon affidavits, except in the parishes I stated where we had no returns, and where we took them on the basis returned by the opposition.
Q. By what?
A. By the opposition. We took all the evidence we had before us and our knowledge of the parishes and their political complexion, and we then decided.

By Mr. CARPENTER:

Q. You estimated it, then, upon the basis of what you thought the vote ought to have been?
A. Yes, sir. That was just the fact, and I think on the whole we were pretty correct.

Mr. CARPENTER. Now I ask the Clerk to read the testimony of the same witness on page 162.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Q. Does not the board canvass all the returns?
A. Yes, sir; it is my impression that Mr. Bovee was a candidate for police jury in his parish.
Q. Being such a candidate, would he not be excluded from acting on the board by the law?
A. The section of the law would seem to look that way.
Q. Would seem to exclude him?
A. Yes, sir; I have read the act, but that, of course, is a legal question I cannot decide.

Mr. CARPENTER. Now I ask the Clerk to read the testimony of the same witness on pages 165 and 166.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Q. Did you have any official returns before you furnished under the laws of Louisiana——
A. Did we have any?
Q. Yes; did you have any?
A. Not unless those I have stated
Q. Did you have any at all?
A. No, sir; I do not think we had.
Q. You had no official returns furnished in pursuance of the laws of Louisiana before you?
A. No, sir.
Q. You made your canvass without those?
A. Yes, sir; we came to the conclusion that there were no official returns in existence, as the law had been trampled upon.
Q. Would the law having been trampled upon prevent an official return from being an official return as well?
A. No, sir; I suppose not.
Q. Then there were official returns somewhere?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. When, as you stated here, you gave notice to Governor Warmoth, did you not suppose he had official returns?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Then there were official returns?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. They were not before you?
A. No, sir.
Q. You counted votes in your estimate which were not polled at all, did you?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Well, upon what ground?
A. On the authority of the United States law, and on the ground or principle of justice.
Q. On the principle of justice you think if a man does not vote he ought to have voted?
A. That is hardly the position; but when we were satisfied a man was prevented from voting.
Q. You then counted it as if he had voted?
A. Yes, sir.

Mr. CARPENTER. Now I ask the Clerk to read from the testimony of the same witness, on pages 167 and 168.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. TRUMBULL:

Q. What do you mean by democratic returns? Did the democrats make returns to you?
A. No, sir; but we had returns from that source, democratic sources.
Q. What do you mean by that?
A. O, well, I do not say returns; we had results published from those sources.
Q. Do you mean official results?
A. Not official, technically, but what purported to be official.
Q. You called them democratic?
A. Not necessarily democratic, but they came from those sources; they were published in some cases in the democratic papers as coming from both sources. We relied upon those in the absence of testimony, and not being able to get other testimony, we gave that as the result.
Q. Did you not throw out two wards in the city of New Orleans, the eighth and ninth wards?
A. We simply stated that the returns before us would not justify us in proclaiming the result.
Q. In two wards?
A. Yes sir; in two wards.
Q. How many votes were there in those wards?
A. I cannot state.
Q. Were there five or ten thousand?
A. The record will show it.
Q. If it does show it, state as near as you can.
A. I do not mean the result I have printed here, but the returns from New Orleans. There is no question about it, as the history of this ballot-box given in these tally-sheets and evidence submitted in connection with this that prevented our making the return.
Q. You made no returns from two wards?
A. None.
Q. Have you no idea of the votes of those two wards?
A. I do not remember, sir.
Q. Can you not tell whether there were one hundred or two thousand voters in those two wards?
A. I am not posted in the politics of the city, and cannot state from memory.
Q. Cannot you state anything about it?
A. Not exactly.
Q. I do not ask for it exactly. Can you tell within a thousand votes?
A. No, sir; I could not.
Q. Were they democratic or republican?
A. Those wards?
Q. Were they Greeley or Grant wards?
A. Now?
Q. At that time, when you threw them out and did not count them, were they Greeley or Grant wards?
A. My impression is that they were Greeley wards.

Mr. CARPENTER. Another witness, Mr. Jaques, appeared before the committee, and at first I was strongly impressed with the belief that he was lying, that his whole story was made up, and I went for him with a pretty thorough cross-examination, followed him through several pages, and finally became thoroughly convinced that the man was telling the truth. He swore that he had forged twelve hundred affidavits; he said he took the names from an old worn-out poll-list, that a great many of them were dead, and a great many probably never did live. He made up the affidavits without seeing the men; hundreds of them. They were certified as sworn to in blank by a judge before they were filled; and the proceeding, as he testifies to it, is one of the richest that I know of in the history of politics. His testimony—I will not stop to read it—is found on pages 520, 521, 522, and 523, and pages 526, 527, 528, and 530, and fully sustains all that I say.

The affidavits were printed, and they were delivered to this fellow to be manufactured, and with the jurat of the judge attached certifying that ——— ——— had sworn to the affidavit. Then Mr. Jaques took the affidavits, filled them up, signed names to them, then delivered twelve hundred of them at one time to Mr. Bovee, in the open session of the board, the testimony leaving no doubt that the board knew that they were forged affidavits; and, indeed, he says that Bovee joked him afterward for days by asking if they had got through voting up at Plaquemines Parish.

In the parish of Tangipahoa, Barkdull swears, on pages 562, 563, and 564, (which I will not take the time to read as I am occupying so much time,) to a very remarkable state of things, and I give the pages so that any Senator can refer to them. The returns show in that parish that Tait had 111 majority over Wands—Tait being the democratic candidate. The witness went to this parish to investigate, and found that there was no particular fraud; nobody had heard of any; and he came down to one of our republican men, and he said, "That won't do; you have got to go back; we are beaten unless we make out some fraud here." He went back, got up some affidavits, came down to this board, and they gave Wands 750 and Tait 622; that is, instead of giving Tait, as the returns showed, 111 majority, they gave his opponent 128.

This is a fair sample and by no means an exaggerated statement;

it is taken at random from the proceedings of that board. They went through in this way and reached the end of their labors on the 6th of December, 1872. The entire returns from the State showed that McEnery had 65,579 votes, and that Kellogg had 55,973 votes, so that McEnery's majority was 9,606. That can be seen in this report on page 81. This Lynch board gave Kellogg 72,890 and McEnery 54,029, making Kellogg's majority 18,861; that is, in place of McEnery's majority as shown by the returns being 9,606, they gave Kellogg almost twice that, 18,861. They were not going to do things by halves. If they were going to have a governor they were not going to stop on the majority that the democratic governor in fact got; they were going better, and they doubled and gave Kellogg 18,000. The returns showed Penn's majority to be 15,000, and they gave Antoine 13,000.

Now, in passing from the proceedings of this Lynch board, let me stop for a moment to enumerate the objections to their proceedings. In the first place, there was no board of any kind. That I have shown. There never was but one man who ever met at any place with other men having a legal right to sit in the board. That was Warmoth with one body, and Lynch with another; the two men never coming together, and their associates never having been members of the board. Then both boards were under valid injunctions from making a count. The Warmoth board respected the injunction; the Lynch board disregarded it. In the next place, they had no jurisdiction to inquire beyond the returns for want of a statement from the commissioner showing riot or fraud. In the third place, they had not a single return to canvass. In the fourth place, on the 20th of November, Warmoth approved a law which he had carried in his pocket for six months, abolishing the board altogether. And I may here remark that if Governor Warmoth, carrying the entire legislative power of that State in his pocket, could not abolish that board, then I undertake to say that board is immortal, and it never can be abolished.

But, Mr. President, there is another feature of this case worth considering. This canvass made by the Lynch board, although utterly void, was exceedingly profitable to the board. Virtue in Louisiana has its reward, and right speedily, too.

Mr. Lynch testifies that Pinchback immediately appointed his son to be inspector of live stock, &c., an office worth from $10,000 to $15,000 a year. This commission was delivered to Mr. Lynch for his son. The son was an engineer on the Southern Pacific road, and was then away in the direction of Texas, five hundred miles from New Orleans. By letter the father arranges with his son that he shall appoint a certain man in New Orleans to be his deputy or clerk. That arrangement is all made by letter, and Pinchback delivers the commission to Lynch by which the son became clothed with this office. The father testified that, on reflection, he thought it might not be well for him, after having made this canvass, to have his son hold that office; so his son resigned it. But after Mr. Lynch had been examined he went back to New Orleans, and Kellogg appointed him to the identical office, and he holds it to this hour, and it is worth from $10,000 to $15,000 per annum.

Herron, during the political campaign, wrote from New York a letter which I will ask the Clerk to read, found on page 572, referring to Southworth, who was recorder of deeds at New Orleans.

NEW YORK, September 3, 1872.

DEAR CAPTAIN: The papers give intelligence of the fusion, and heartily glad was I to see it. This makes the election of the combined ticket a certainty, and will do much toward helping the cause in the North. I shall get home in time to help, and to assist in the count and make the certificates of the "duly elected." In the mean time, as you and I are both very fond of Dr. Southworth, I think I shall have to get you to speak to Governor McEnery for his place. Of course we do not want him turned out, but under the circumstances, &c., let us ask him to retire. There is no sort of question about the election of Greeley, but the Grant people are making great exertions. With regards to all, I am,

Truly, yours,

F. J. HERRON.

Captain J. C. SINNOTT.

Mr. CARPENTER. He had a desire to be recorder of deeds. He went home, he changed his views as to who had been elected and who had carried Louisiana, but he saved the place of recorder of deeds for New Orleans; Pinchback appointed him to it.

Longstreet is levee commissioner, appointed by Mr. Pinchback, a place worth $6,000, salary fixed by law.

Now see how handsomely Hawkins was provided for. The Legislature abolished two courts, created a new court, and conferred upon it the jurisdiction that pertained to both the former courts. Of this new court Hawkins was appointed judge, with exclusive jurisdiction of contested elections, injunctions, and mandamuses. Faithful over a few things, made ruler over many things! [Laughter.] He was so useful in the canvass of Kellogg he shall canvass everybody; all contested elections shall be decided by Hawkins!

Nor did the Legislature forget Mr. Pinchback. The Lynch board canvassed in a Legislature, and the Legislature made Pinchback governor by impeaching Warmoth, and Pinchback rewarded the Lynch board. No wonder that these functionaries all recognize each other as entitled to hold their respective offices. That made Pinchback governor. And they did not forget Pinchback even there. The Legislature, so manufactured, further rewarded Pinchback by sending him to the Senate.

Whatever else may be said of these rascals, they certainly are kind to each other. [Laughter.] All these adjustments of reward were made between December 9, 1872, and the second Tuesday of January, 1873. Prompt pay! Adequate pay!

Here I bid adieu to the Lynch board. When my friend from Indiana comes to reply, and brings this Lynch board again to the front for effective service, I commend him to a careful examination of the facts which I have read from their own statements, made under oath in his and my presence.

I now come, Mr. President, to consider the interference of the General Government in this muddle. November 14, 1872, the board of canvassers divided, as I have before stated, into the Lynch board and the Warmoth board, and proceeded to litigate. While this contest was going on, on the 16th of November, Kellogg commenced suit in the United States circuit court, and Durell issued an injunction, or restraining order, which I will ask the Clerk to read from pages 13, 14, and 15 of the report.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

United States of America, circuit court of the United States, fifth circuit and district of Louisiana, November term, A. D. 1872.

WILLIAM P. KELLOGG vs. H. C. WARMOTH et al. } No. 6830.

NEW ORLEANS, Saturday, November 16, 1872.

Court met pursuant to adjournment. Present Hon. E. H. Durell, district judge.

On motion of J. R. Beckwith, counsel and solicitor for complainant, it is ordered that H. C. Warmoth, Jack Wharton, Frank H. Hatch, Durant Da Ponte, John McEnery, and the New Orleans Republican Printing Company, publishers of the New Orleans Republican, a newspaper, being the official journal of the State of Louisiana, be enjoined and restrained from in any manner, either directly or indirectly, pretending to consider or canvass any certificate, statement, or return of any supervisor of registration, except in the presence of the legal returning officers named in the bill of complaint filed this day, to wit, John Lynch, Jacob Hawkins, James Longstreet, and Francis J. Herron; and it is further ordered that the said H. C. Warmoth desist and refrain from submitting to the defendants, Jack Wharton, Frank H. Hatch, and Durant Da Ponte, or any or either of them, either as pretended members of any board of returning officers of elections of the State of Louisiana, or as individuals, any statements, certificates of returns, or pretended statements, certificates, or returns of election, and to desist from assisting, aiding, abetting, or permitting any other person or persons whatsoever, other than John Lynch, Jacob Hawkins, James Longstreet, and Francis J. Herron, or their duly qualified successors, as returning officers, to inspect, consider, or have custody of or access to said statements, certificates, or returns of said supervisors of registration, or any other paper, document, affidavit, or proof that may have come into the hands of the said Warmoth, or shall hereafter come into his hands, relating to said election, or to the fairness or correctness thereof, and which by law it is his duty to submit to the said John Lynch, Jacob Hawkins, James Longstreet, and Francis J. Herron, the said legal board of returning officers of elections, and which should be properly considered by them.

And it is further ordered that the said H. C. Warmoth, Jack Wharton, Frank H. Hatch, and Durant Da Ponte, and each of them, be commanded and enjoined to refrain and desist from pretending to act together as a board of returning officers, or as returning officers of election, from canvassing or attempting to canvass or consider any certificate, document, affidavit, return, statement of votes, or any paper whatsoever properly relating to said election mentioned in the said bill of complaint, and from attempting to make a canvass, to make, declare, or publish any pretended deduction, calculation, statement, or proclamation based thereon, or pretended to be derived therefrom, in any way relating or pertaining to said election mentioned in the said bill of complaint, held on the 4th day of November, 1872, or certifying to any candidate for office at said election, any certificate of election, or any statement of the result of said election tending to show any right to office in any person growing out of ballots cast at said election, and from meddling with, altering, suppressing, falsifying, obliterating, or destroying any document, paper, voucher, proof, statement of votes, or certificate relating to said election. And it is further ordered that the said John McEnery be commanded, enjoined, restrained, and inhibited from in any manner acting or pretending to act as governor of the State of Louisiana, and from making any pretensions or asserting any claim to the office of governor of said State by virtue of any pretended evidence of election thereto under or by virtue of any certificate, document, or count, canvass, or adjudication now or hereafter made by the said defendant H. C. Warmoth, and the said defendants Jack Wharton, Frank H. Hatch, Durant Da Ponte, in this bill charged to be unlawfully combined and conspired as returning officers. And it is further ordered that the said New Orleans Republican Printing Company, under whose control and direction the newspaper called the New Orleans Republican, the official journal of the State of Louisiana, is published, whereof W. R. Fish is president, be enjoined and restrained from in any manner publishing any official notice, document, or statement relating to any canvass or statement of votes made, or pretended to be made, or in aay manner emanating from the said H. C. Warmoth, and said Jack Wharton, Frank H. Hatch, Durant Da Ponte, or either of them, as a pretended board of returning officers of elections, in any manner relating to the said election held on the 4th day of November, A. D. 1872.

And it is further ordered that the said defendants H. C. Warmoth, Jack Wharton, Frank H. Hatch, Durant Da Ponte, John McEnery, and the New Orleans Republican Printing Company, named in the bill of complaint this day filed, be so commanded, enjoined, and restrained until the further order of this honorable court.

Mr. CARPENTER. That, you will see, is rather a remarkable document to be issued by a judicial officer, and still more remarkable when issued by a judicial officer of the United States who had no jurisdiction whatever of any suit brought to inquire into the question which of these two boards was the legal canvassing board. The bill filed before him was a bill merely to perpetuate testimony; that is, the returns themselves; but in this injunction he assumes to determine which is the legal board and which is the illegal board, and assumes to take the governor of that State into his jurisdiction and command him how he shall perform his duties under the election law of 1870.

But Governor Warmoth was not to be outdone in this way; and at this juncture of affairs he approves the new election law, on the 20th of November, 1872, which abolished the board without regard to which class of persons constituted the board. It abolished it by a total repeal of all former election laws, and provided that a board of canvassers should be elected by the senate, and expressly and flatly and in words repealed every prior election law. Of course, all the rights that these men, any of them, had to proceed as a canvassing board, they possessed under the election law of 1870; and when this act was approved it repealed the election law of 1870, and their authority, whatever it was, was thereby extinguished.

On the 3d of December Warmoth appointed a new board under this bill, which he claimed created vacancies in vacation. And in one sense it did, because it legislated the old board out of existence and provided for a new board; and the bill was approved in the vacation of the Legislature; and it certainly did create offices which were vacant. The board thus appointed is called the De Feriet board; consisting of five persons, whose names may be found in the report, and the governor laid before them the returns which had come to him as governor, and which it was the duty of the board of canvassers, if anybody could ascertain who they were, to canvass. This De Feriet board canvassed the returns, and the result of their labors was proclaimed in the New Orleans papers, in the form prescribed by law, on the next day, December 4.

On the 6th of December Judge Durell seems to have become apprehensive that Warmoth was getting ahead of him. The judge's injunction, issued without the slightest authority, had been met by an act approved by the governor by main strength on the 20th. This act in its turn was overthrown by another proceeding of Judge Durell, which has no parallel in judicial history. On the 6th of December, at two o'clock in the morning, Judge Durell, at his own house, without being applied to by any party, issued an order for seizing the state-house, which I will ask the Clerk to read from pages 16 to 17 of the report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What do you mean by his not being applied to by any party?

Mr. CARPENTER. He went home to take his dinner, put on his slippers, reviewed the field of operations, and finally took it into his head to issue an order seizing the state-house.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Circuit court of the United States, fifth circuit and district of Louisiana, in equity—No. 6830. William P. Kellogg vs. H. C. Warmoth et als. Whereas Henry C. Warmoth, one of the respondents herein, has, in violation of the restraining order herein, issued the following proclamation and returns of certain persons claiming to be a board of returning officers, all in violation and contempt of the said restraining order, as follows, namely:

PROCLAMATION.

STATE OF LOUISIANA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
New Orleans, December 4, 1872.

Whereas P. S. Wiltz, Gabriel De Feriet, Thomas Isabelle, J. A. Taylor, and J. E. Austin, returning officers appointed by the governor to fill vacancies existing, in accordance with the constitution and laws of the State of Louisiana, have made declaration of the result of an election held November 4, 1872, and have declared certain persons elected to the senate and house of representatives of the State of Louisiana, as will appear from the returns herewith attached and made a part of this proclamation; and whereas such returns are compiled from the official returns of commissioners of election and supervisors of registration, on file in this office, and are in fact and in form accurate and correct, and made in accordance with law:

Now, therefore, I, Henry Clay Warmoth, governor of the State of Louisiana, do issue this my proclamation, making known the result of said election aforesaid, and command all officers and persons within the State of Louisiana to take notice of and respect the same.

Given under my hand and the seal of the State this 4th day of December, A. D. 1872, and of the Independence of the United States the ninety-seventh.

H. C. WARMOTH.

By the Governor:
Y. A. WOODWARD,
Assistant Secretary of State.

Now, therefore, in order to prevent the further obstruction of the proceedings in this cause, and, further, to prevent a violation of the orders of this court, to the imminent danger of disturbing the public peace, it is hereby ordered, that the marshal of the United States for the district of Louisiana shall forthwith take possession of the building known as the Mechanics' Institute, and occupied as the state-house for the assembling of the Legislature therein, in the city of New Orleans, and hold the same subject to the further order of this court, and meanwhile to prevent all unlawful assemblage therein under the guise or pretext of authority claimed by virtue of pretended canvass and returns made by said pretended returning officers in contempt and violation of said restraining order; but the marshal is directed to allow the ingress and egress to and from the public offices in said building of persons entitled to the same.

E. H. DURELL.

Mr. CARPENTER. So you will see, Mr. President, that is the order of the judge, not of the court. The testimony shows that he went to his lodgings, and about eleven o'clock at night he issued this order to seize the state-house. Nobody applied to him for the order. He was neither sitting in chambers nor sitting in court. He does not pretend to issue a writ. This order has no form of judicial process. It is not directed to the marshal; it is not attested in the name of the Chief Justice of the United States; it has not the seal of any court; it is the mere order of the district judge, at his chambers, at midnight, commanding the marshal of the United States to seize the state-house of a State. The marshal executed that order, and a company of Federal troops garrisoned the state-house at midnight and held it in military custody for more than six weeks, during which time the farce of organizing the Legislature on the mandamus of this same judge was enacted, and Pinchback was elected Senator by this Legislature while the state-house was held in military custody. At eleven o'clock a. m., December 6, Durell made the restraining order which he had made before a perpetual injunction. The same day the Lynch board completed their canvass, and December 7, 1872, Antoine commenced his suit, the state-house being in possession of the troops; and in that suit Durell issued the injunction and mandamus, for it is both, upon which the Legislature of the State was organized.

Now, without taking time to read it, as I had intended to do—for I am getting too weary to do that—let me call your attention to the extent of the jurisdiction of the Federal court in respect to a State election. The fifteenth amendment to the Constitution provides that no man shall be deprived of the right to vote on the ground of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, and that the Congress shall have power to legislate, so as to give effect to this amendment. Congress has legislated, and has provided that if any man shall be deprived of an office in consequence of a citizen having been denied the right to vote on the ground of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, he may bring his suit and be installed into the office by the judgment of a Federal court, except it be the office of "elector of President or Vice-President, Representative or Delegate in Congress, or member of a State Legislature." The very act of Congress under which Durell pretended to proceed and entertain a suit to organize this Legislature, in express words excludes members of the Legislature from the jurisdiction which is granted by the act. If, for instance, a man is a candidate in Louisiana, and is defeated by five majority, and he can show that ten colored citizens went to the polls and offered to vote for him; but were denied the right to vote upon the ground of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, then he may have his office adjudged to him by the Federal court, unless the office for which he was a candidate be that of elector of President or Vice-President, Representative or Delegate in Congress, or member of a State Legislature; but in no case has a Federal court jurisdiction as to these offices. So that the Federal court was without the slightest pretext or show of jurisdiction in the Antoine suit. It was a suit brought by the lieutenant-governor, to declare who had been elected to the Legislature, and to restrain another class, who were pretending to be elected, from taking seats in the Legislature—the very case excepted by the act of Congress from Federal jurisdiction. The judge enjoined the officers of both houses of the Legislature from calling the democrats; it commanded them in the form of a mandamus to call the republicans; and under that injunction and mandamus the Legislature was organized which made this prmia facie case, which the Senator from Indiana says has been so indorsed and so sanctioned that it has stripped the Senate of its constitutional power to determine whether Mr. Pinchback has been elected by the Legislature. I will have that paper read, and I wish it could be read in the hearing of every citizen of the United States.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Circuit court of the United States in and for the district of Louisiana.

C. C. ANTOINE vs. H. C. WARMOTH et als. } No. 6861—in equity.

Restraining order.—Issued December 7, 1872.

Whereas the plaintiff herein has this day filed and exhibited his bill of complaint against the said defendant, H. C. Warmoth, and the other defendants named in said bill of complaint, and has therein prayed that injunctions, pendente lite, issue against the defendants therein, and that a restraining order be also issued restraining the said defendants as prayed for in said bill from doing or permitting to be done the acts in said bill complained of:

Now, therefore, on motion of J. R. Beckwith and E. C. Billings, solicitors for complainant, it is ordered that the defendants named in said bill do show cause on the 11th day of December, 1872, why injunctions, pendente lite, should not be allowed as prayed for. It is further ordered that said defendants each and every one of them be, and are hereby, commanded and restrained to the extent and effect as in said bill of complaint prayed [the clerk will attach to this order a copy of the prayer for injunction as set forth in said bill of complaint] until the hearing and determination of said rule for injunction, and until the further order of the court in the premises.

A true and correct copy of the original order on file in this cause.

F. A. WOOLFLEY, Clerk.

Mr. CARPENTER. It will be seen that this order restrains the parties according to the prayer for relief in the bill, which must be read to show the extent of the injunction.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Wherefore your orator humbly prays that your honor will grant unto him all just and proper relief in the premises; that you will allow and grant unto him the most gracious writ of injunction issued under the seal of this honorable court, directed to the said defendant, Henry C. Warmoth, enjoining and restraining him from in any manner, directly or indirectly, by himself or through any other officer of the State, city, or parish, or through any other person, from controlling or attempting to control, interfering with, or attempting to interfere with, the organization of either branch of this General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, called to assemble on the 9th day of December, A. D. 1872, or that may be called to assemble at any future day, and from directly or indirectly, either by himself or through any other person, preventing any person claiming to be a member of said General Assembly from having full and free ingress and egress to and from the place, building, and room of that branch of said General Assembly of which he may claim to be a member, or from issuing any written or oral order or instruction, request, or direction, calculated or designed to directly or indirectly control or interfere with the organization of either of the branches of said General Assembly, or calculated or designed to prevent any person from having free access thereto, who claims to be a member thereof, and from doing any act, or from giving any order, direction, or making any request which may, directly or indirectly, prevent or hinder any person from being present and taking part in the organization of said senate, called to convene on the said 9th day of December, or at any future day, who may be returned as a member thereof by the board of returning officers, composed of the said Henry C. Warmoth, George E. Bovee, James Longstreet, Jacob Hawkins, and John Lynch, and whose name shall also be transmitted by the said George E. Bovee, secretary of state, to Charles H. Merritt, the secretary of the senate of the last General Assembly, and placed by the said Merritt upon the roll of said senate, so to be convened, and from in any manner, directly or indirectly, aiding or abetting any person who is not so returned by said returning board as a member of said senate, so to be convened, and whose name is not so transmitted as a member elected to said senate, and is not so placed upon the roll of said senate, from participating in the organization of said senate, and from doing any act, or from giving any order, direction, or making any request which may, directly or indirectly, prevent or hinder any person from being present and taking part in the organization of said house, called to convene on the said 9th day of December, or that may be called to convene at any future day, who may be returned as a member thereof by the board of returning officers composed of the said Henry C. Warmoth, George E. Bovee, James Longstreet, Jacob Hawkins, and John Lynch; and whose name shall also be transmitted by the said George E. Bovee, secretary of state, to William Vigers, the secretary of the house of the last General Assembly, and placed by the said William Vigers upon the roll of said house, so to be convened, and from in any manner, directly or indirectly, aiding or abetting any person who is not so returned by said returning board as a member of said house, so to be convened, and whose name is not so transmitted as a member elected to said house, and is not so placed upon the roll of said house, from participating in the organization of said house; except that the said Henry C. Warmoth is not hereby prohibited from participating in the canvass and return of the members elected to the said branches of said General Assembly, so to be convened, provided he do the same in conjunction with and in the presence of said George E. Bovee, James Longstreet, Jacob Hawkins, and John Lynch, but not otherwise. And that he further be enjoined and restrained from in any manner obstructing or hindering the said William Vigers, clerk of the house of representatives, or the said secretary of the senate, Charles H. Merritt, in the free and unobstructed discharge of their duties, or in full and complete obedience to the orders of this court, and from suspending, removing them, or either of them from office, or appointing or ordering, or abetting any other person or persons to perform any act which by law or the orders of this court devolves on either the said Vigers, Merritt, or upon George E. Bovee, secretary of state, and from recognizing any validity in any act done or performed by any other person or persons pretending to act in the office or capacity of either of said officers.

And that a writ of injunction may also issue, directed to A. S. Badger, chief of metropolitan police, and to each member of the board of the metropolitan police, and to the board of metropolitan police, enjoining and restraining them and each of them from interfering in any manner with the organization of either branch of the General Assembly to be convened on the 9th of December, A. D. 1872, or at any time thereafter, except to preserve the peace, and to prevent no person from having access to either of the halls of said houses who is certified by George E. Bovee as being a member-elect of the same.

Mr. CARPENTER. That metropolitan police were a part of the militia of the State of Louisiana. The district judge having taken possession of the state-house by Federal troops, enjoined the State militia from interfering.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

And that writs of injunction also issue, directed to the said E. Booth, A. Voorhees, A. J. Lewis, B. F. Jonas, T. B. Stamps, D. S. Cage, R. C. White, T. C. Anderson, J. M. Thompson, E. S. Weber, A. S. Herron, Robert Worrall, O. H. Brewster, E. M. Graham, J. W. McDonald, A. H. Leonard, C. J. C. Puckett, James G. White, J. F. Kelly, enjoining and restraining them and each of them from participating in any manner in the organization of the senate to be convened on the 9th day of December, A. D. 1872, or at any time thereafter, or from doing any act or thing toward, in, or about the organization of said senate, either by casting a vote or otherwise, unless his name shall be and appear on the list of names of members of said senate transmitted to the secretary of the same by George E. Bovee, secretary of state, as having been elected thereto.

And that a writ of injunction also issue to the said J. J. Mellon and James Timony, J. A. Shakespeare, J. A. Rice, J. J. Finney, E. H. McCaleb, Charles Montaldo, W. B. Barrett, W. L. Standford, T. B. Schultz, William A. Strong, enjoining and restraining them, and each of them, from participating in any manner in the organization of the house of representatives to be convened on the 9th day of December, A. D. 1872, or at any time thereafter, or from doing any act or thing toward, in, or about the organization of the same, either by casting a vote or otherwise, unless his name shall be and appear on the list of names of members of said house transmitted to the clerk of the same by George E. Bovee, secretary of state, as having been elected to the same.

And that a writ of injunction may also issue, directed to Charles H. Merritt, secretary of the senate of the last General Assembly, enjoining and restraining him from placing, causing, or suffering to be placed, upon the roll of the senate to be convened on the 9th December, A. D. 1872, or at any time thereafter, or from placing, causing, or suffering to be placed, upon any list of members-elect to said last-mentioned senate, or from announcing, causing, or suffering to be announced, as a member elected to said last-mentioned senate, or from recognizing, or causing, or suffering to be recognized, as a member elected to said last-mentioned senate, or from in any manner designating, or causing, or suffering to be designated, as a member to the said last-mentioned senate, prior or during the organization thereof, any person whose name shall not be transmitted to him by George E. Bovee, the secretary of state, upon a list of the names of such persons as have been elected to the said last-mentioned senate, and from in any manner acting upon any other list; except the one so transmitted by the said George E. Bovee, in the organization of the last-mentioned senate, and to disregard in said organization all other lists.

And that a writ of injunction may also issue directed to William Vigers, clerk of the house of representatives of the last General Assembly, enjoining and restraining him from placing, causing, or suffering to be placed, upon the roll of the house of representatives to be convened on the 9th of December, A. D. 1872, or at any time thereafter, or from placing, causing, or suffering to be placed, upon any list of members elected to said last-mentioned house, or from announcing, causing, or suffering to be announced, as a member elected to said last-mentioned house of representatives, or from recognizing, or causing, or suffering to be recognized, as a member elected to said last-mentioned house of representatives, or from in any manner designating, or causing, or suffering to be designated, as a member to the said last-mentioned house, prior or during the organization thereof, any person whose name shall not be transmitted to him by George E. Bovee, the secretary of state, upon a list of the names of such persons as have been elected to the said last-mentioned house of representatives, and from in any manner acting upon any other list, except the one so transmitted by the said George E. Bovee, in the organization of the last-mentioned house of representatives, and to disregard in said organization all other lists.

And that a writ of injunction also issue directed to said George E. Bovee, enjoining and restraining him from receiving any return or returns of the election of any State officers or of the members of either branch of the General Assembly of the State of Louisiana, excepting such returns as may be received by or filed in the office of him as secretary of state from the board of returning officers and a majority of the same, composed of Henry C. Warmoth, James Longstreet, and Jacob Hawkins, and John Lynch, and himself, and from delivering, causing, or suffering to be delivered, to any speaker of the house of representatives any return, except received and filed as above stated, of any election whatever, or from making, or causing, or suffering to be made, any list of names of the members elected to either branch of the General Assembly, except from and according to returns so received or filed, as above stated.

That a writ of injunction also issue directed to the said Jack Wharton and Samuel Armstead, and each of them, enjoining and restraining them and each of them from receiving any returns of the elections held in the State of Louisiana on the first Monday of November last past for members of the General Assembly, or from transmitting to William Vigers, the clerk of the house of representatives, or to Charles H. Merritt, the secretary of the senate of the last General Assembly, or to any other person, any list of names which is or purports to be a list of names of such persons, or the name of any person who, according to any returns, shall have been, or shall be stated, or claimed, or assumed to have been, elected to either branch of the General Assembly, called to convene on the 9th day of December, A. D. 1872, or that may be called to convene at any future time, and from making any statement or doing anything calculated or designed to furnish a basis for the organization of either of said branches of the said General Assembly, or from delivering or interfering, conniving at or aiding, or suffering any other person to deliver, to the speaker of the house of representatives, or any other person, any returns of any election whatever.

And that writs of injunction may also issue directed to the said Thomas Isabelle, P. S. Wiltz, J. S. Taylor, J. E. Austin, and G. De Feriet; also issue against the said H. C. Warmoth, Jack Wharton, Frank H. Hatch, and Durant Da Ponte, commanding them and each of them to refrain and desist from pretending to act together as a board of returning officers or as returning officers of elections, from canvassing or attempting to canvass or consider any certificate, document, affidavit, return, statement of votes, or any paper whatsoever properly relating to said election, and from attempting to make a canvass, declare or publish any pretended deduction, calculation, statement, or proclamation based thereon, or pretended to be derived therefrom, in any way relating or pertaining to said election, held on the 4th day of November, 1872, or certifying to any candidate for office at said election any certificate of election, or any statement of the result of said election tending to show any right to office in any person growing out of ballots cast at said election, and from meddling with, altering, suppressing, falsifying, obliterating, or destroying any document, paper, voucher, proof, statement of votes, or certificates relating to said election.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the complainant's prayer for injunction in his bill of complaint in the cause of Cæsar C. Antoine vs. Henry C. Warmoth et al., No. 6851 of the docket of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Louisiana, referred to and made a part of the subjoined restraining order.

[SEAL.] F. A. WOOLFLEY, Clerk.

JANUARY 3, 1873.

Mr. CARPENTER. I have had this injunction read so that Senators may see that it justifies all I have said about it. It was a double-faced document; it was an injunction against the democrats, it was a mandamus in favor of the republicans; to the democrats a sword, to the republicans a shield. All that a republican partisan could decently have asked, even from such a judge, in organizing that Legislature, was that he should enjoin the democrats from going in, and leave the republicans at liberty to go in or stay out as they pleased. But having his hand in, he was determined to do thorough work, and by his injunction he kept the democrats out, and by his mandamus he put the republicans in.

[At this point the honorable Senator yielded for an executive session.]

FRIDAY, January 30, 1874.

Mr. CARPENTER, (resuming:) Mr. President, when the Senate were kind enough to adjourn yesterday, I had had the Clerk read the remarkable order which was made by Judge Durell, combining both the qualities of an injunction and a mandamus, restraining the officers of the Legislature from calling one set of men and commanding them to call the names of another set of men. These orders of Judge Durell are the more censurable from the fact that Congress had provided by the thirteenth section of the enforcement act as follows:

It shall be lawful for the President of the United States to employ such part of the land or naval forces of the United States, or of the militia, as shall be necessary to aid in the execution of judicial process issued under this act.

Thus conferring a power upon the President which is equivalent to making it his duty in all cases to execute the process of judicial courts. It may well be doubted whether in strictness these orders were regular on their face; but that is one of those questions that a marshal of the United States can hardly be called upon to decide. The circuit court for Louisiana, like all our circuit courts, is one of general jurisdiction: and unless the defect of jurisdiction in the particular case appeared upon the face of the process, it was a protection to the marshal, and the President was bound to enforce it. Let me repeat what I said in discussing this matter at the last session. I do not disapprove of the President's issuing orders for the enforcement of Judge Durell's orders. The President is necessarily in one place. Courts are sitting in various places, and may be sitting in thirty-seven States at the same moment. The Constitution makes it the duty of the President to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. In discharging this duty he can have no better guide than the decisions of the judicial courts. Indeed, having no judicial power, the President has no right to review the decisions of the judicial tribunals. It his duty to enforce all of them. The judge who makes an erroneous decision is answerable for it, if it be corruptly made. But to say that the President may enforce one, and refuse to enforce another decision, is to clothe him with judicial power, which is denied to him by the Constitution; and when he is informed that the United States court in Maine, or in California, or in Florida, or in Wisconsin, has made a certain order, he can do no less in the nature of things than to execute that order. So I lay no censure whatever upon the action of the President; none whatever upon the action of the marshal; and I complain only of Judge Durell for the occupation of the state-house by troops. The responsibility of that act rests upon that judge, and not upon the marshal and not upon the President.

I come now to consider another thing, which the Senator from Indiana relies upon as estopping the Senate in this investigation, to wit, the recognition of Kellogg as governor, and the Legislature, which is known as the Kellogg government, by the President of the United States. And here it becomes necessary to distinguish between the preliminary dispatches that were sent by telegraph between persons in Louisiana and persons in Washington, running through the month of December, 1872, and a part of January, 1873, and the subsequent action of the President of the United States, upon the application made to him by Kellogg, which I shall particularly mention hereafter.

These telegrams are a telegram from the Attorney-General to Packard, in these words:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 3, 1872.

S. B. PACKARD, Esq.,
United States Marshal, New Orleans, Louisiana:

You are to enforce the decrees and mandates of the United States courts, no matter by whom resisted, and General Emory will furnish you with all necessary troops for that purpose.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

That was several days before the order had been issued by Judge Durell to which I have referred.

Then there is a dispatch from Mr. Casey to the President, found on page 55 of the report. I have not the strength, and will not take the time, to read all these dispatches; but I will refer to them with the pages of the report where they can be found, so that Senators can examine them if they please. The dispatch of Casey to the President, on page 55, I think I will read:

President GRANT:

Marshal Packard took possession of state-house this morning, at an early hour, with military posse, in obedience to a mandate of circuit court, to prevent illegal assemblage of persons under guise of authority of Warmoth's returning board, in violation of injunction of circuit court. Decree of court just rendered declares Warmoth's returning board illegal, and orders the returns of the election to be forthwith placed before the legal board. This board will probably soon declare the result of the election of officers of State and Legislature, which will meet in state-house with protection of court. The decree was sweeping in its provisions——

There never was a more appropriate comment than that. The decree swept away a Legislature, it swept away the organization of one of the members of this Union.

The decree was sweeping in its provisions, and if enforced will save the republican majority, and give Louisiana a republican Legislature and State government, and check Warmoth in his usurpations. Warmoth's democratic supporters are becoming disgusted with him, and charging that his usurpations are ruining their cause.

JAS. F. CASEY.

Then follows a telegram from Packard to the Attorney-General, found on page 55 of the report; another from Packard to the Attorney-General, on the same page; another from Packard to the Attorney-General, on page 56; another from Packard, on the same page; another from Pinchback to the President, page 57 of the report, which I will read:

President GRANT:

Having taken the oath of office and being in the possession of the gubernatorial office, it devolves upon me to urge the necessity of a favorable consideration of the request of the General Assembly as conveyed in the concurrent resolution of this day telegraphed to you requesting the protection of the United States Government. Be pleased to send the necessary orders to General Emory. This seems to me a necessary measure of precaution, although all is quiet here.

P. B. S. PINCHBACK,
Lieutenant-Governor, Acting Governor of Louisiana.

No "insurrection," no "domestic violence;" everything was quiet, but, as a precaution, the demand was made for the intervention of the General Government.

On page 57 is the communication from Mr. Pinchback, which he refers to in the telegram just read:

We have the honor to transmit to your excellency the following concurrent resolution of both houses of the General Assembly, and to request an early reply:

"Whereas the General Assembly is now convened, in compliance with the call of the governor, and certain evil-disposed persons are reported to be forming combinations to disturb the public peace, defy the lawful authority, and the State is threatened with violence: Therefore,

"Be it resolved by the senate and house of representatives of the State of Louisiana in General Assembly convened, That the President of the United States be requested to afford the protection guaranteed each State by the Constitution of the United States, when threatened with domestic violence, and that the presiding officers of the General Assembly transmit this resolution immediately, by telegraph or otherwise, to the President of the United States.

"Adopted in General Assembly convened this 9th day of December, A. D. 1872."

P. B. S. PINCHBACK,
Lieutenant-Governor, and President of the Senate.
CHAS. W. LOWELL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

I may say that on receiving that communication from Governor Pinchback the President himself apparently paid no attention to it; and here I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana specially to this point. I maintain that there is nothing whatever here to show that the President of the United States has ever recognized the Kellogg Legislature. The Kellogg Legislature sent to the President these resolutions, declaring, not that insurrection against the State existed, but that domestic violence was threatened; and there is a subsequent telegram from the governor to the President asking action, although he says "everything is quiet;" that is, there is no insurrection, there is no domestic violence; and I maintain that in all this correspondence there is nothing to show that the President has ever recognized any Legislature whatever in that State; because the President did not act, in the only way he is authorized to act, upon their call.

The two telegrams from Pinchback to the President, and one to the Attorney-General, are found on pages 57 and 58; another, from Casey to the President, on page 58; another, from Kellogg to the Attorney-General, on page 58; another, from Casey to the President, on page 59; one from Casey to the President, again, on page 59; from the Attorney-General to Governor Pinchback, on page 59; and this last I will read:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, December 12, 1872.

Acting Governor PINCHBACK,
New Orleans, Louisiana:

Let it be understood that you are recognized by the President as the lawful executive of Louisiana, and that the body assembled at Mechanics' Institute is the lawful Legislature of the State, and it is suggested that you make proclamation to that effect, and also that all necessary assistance will be given to you and the Legislature herein recognized to protect the State from disorder and violence.

GEO. H. WILLIAMS,
Attorney-General.

Mr. MORTON. Was that by authority of the President?

Mr. CARPENTER. That you will have to ask the Attorney-General.

Mr. MORTON. Does the Senator deny that it was by his authority?

Mr. CARPENTER. I know nothing about it.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator just said that the President had never recognized the Legislature; and there is an express recognition of the body sitting at Mechanics' Institute.

Mr. CARPENTER. I knew that the Senator from Indiana regarded this as a recognition. I knew that when he came to reply to me he would read it. For that reason I read it myself, and I propose to comment upon it. I maintain that that is no recognition of the Legislature of that State which can have the slightest legal effect upon anybody. And now let us see about that question. Let us see under what circumstances the President can interfere in the affairs of a State, and how he is to interfere. The Constitution provides in these words:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on application of the Legislature, or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence.

This does not authorize the President to do anything. It grants authority to the United States. The last clause of the legislative article empowers Congress—

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all the powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States—

That is the very power which we are now speaking of—or in any department or officer thereof.

You will observe, Mr. President, that the language of the Constitution makes it the duty of the United States to guarantee any State against domestic violence. That is to be provided for by law which shall regulate the time, mode, and manner of enforcing that guarantee. When you turn to see what Congress has done under that provision, you find that Congress has not exhausted the power that is conferred by this clause of the Constitution. This phrase, "guarantee a State against domestic violence," may be broad enough to cover every case of tumult and riot and disorder that may happen in a State. I do not say that it covers the whole field, but it may do so. "Domestic violence" is a very general and very broad phrase, and if Congress in a particular instance should see fit to legislate for the purpose of suppressing riots in a State, I am not certain that it would not have the power, under this clause of the Constitution, to pass a law for that purpose; but Congress has not passed such a law. But let us see what Congress has done. The first act upon the subject was that of 1792, to be found in 1 Statutes at Large, 264, which by its terms was to expire in two years, and at the end of the then next session of Congress. That act provided as follows:

In case of an insurrection in any State against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application, &c., to call forth such number of the militia, &c.

Not "in case of domestic violence," leaving the President to judge whether it was a proper case to interfere or not, but it must be that kind of domestic violence which amounts to an insurrection against the government of the State. Anything short of that does not authorize the President to interfere at all.

Mark how carefully Congress has defined the power conferred upon the President. There is nothing in all the powers conferred upon this Government so delicate and so difficult of proper exercise as those powers which authorize us to meddle in the affairs of a State. There we come in conflict with the prejudice in favor of State rights, deeply imbedded in American thought; we come in contact with the pride and the vanity of States; and of all our powers none are so likely to involve us in trouble as those which bring us into contact with the affairs of a State. Congress has recognized this fact, and has sought to avoid its difficulty. It has not authorized the President to call out troops in case of domestic violence, but only in case of one kind of domestic violence, to wit, that which amounts to insurrection in any State against the government thereof. Then, by section 3 of this act, it is provided that before the President shall call forth the militia, he shall issue a proclamation commanding the insurgents to disperse within a time to be named by him.

On the 28th of February, 1795, before this act had expired by its terms, being in the session of Congress which followed the expiration of two years from the passage of the act, the act was repealed, and a new act was passed upon the same subject, which is still in force, and under which the interference was made in the Rhode Island case, and under which it was pretended to be made in this Louisiana case. It is just as precise as the other. Its provision is—following precisely the language of the former act. Then, again, in section 3, it is provided that the President shall immediately issue a proclamation commanding the insurgents to disperse, &c.

The next, and, so far as I know, the only other act applicable to this subject, is the act of March 3, 1807, to be found in 2 Statutes at Large, page 443. The act of February 28, 1795, will be found in Statutes at Large, page 424.

Mr. MORTON. I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that he has overlooked the second section of the act of 1795 altogether. He confines the case in which the President is authorized to interfere to a case of insurrection. That is provided for in the first section. The second section provides:

Whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed or the execution thereof obstructed in any State by combinations too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings, or by the powers vested in the marshals by this act, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia, &c.

Mr. CARPENTER. What has that to do with this question?

Mr. MORTON. The Senator overlooked it; that is all.

Mr. CARPENTER. No; I did not overlook it.

Mr. MORTON. You did not mention it.

Mr. CARPENTER. I did not mention it because it had no more to do with the matter I am discussing, than a chapter from the Koran. There are two cases provided for by the act. One is the case we are speaking about, authorizing intervention in the affairs of a State; the other is a case entirely within the Government of the United States, where the President is required to execute our laws without application from any State. If our laws are resisted in New York, or in Florida, or anywhere else, he must enforce them. The case provided for by the first section and the case we are discussing is the case of an insurrection in a State, where the State applies to the President to suppress such insurrection. That second section has nothing to do with what I am discussing.

Here let me call particular attention to the language of the act of March 3, 1807, because an ambiguity in expression led the person who drew this proclamation—I suppose, of course, it was not drawn by the President—into an error, I think, as to the effect of the act. The act is as follows. I will first read it, without note or comment:

That in all cases of insurrection or obstruction to the laws, either of the United States, or of any individual State or Territory, where it is lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia for the purpose of suppressing such insurrection, or of causing the laws to be duly executed, it shall be lawful for him to employ, for the same purpose, such part of the land or naval force of the United States as shall be judged necessary, having first observed all the prerequisites of the law in that respect.

The first two acts which I have read only authorized the President to call out the militia; he could not use the Army or the Navy. This act was passed only for the purpose of enabling him to use the Army and Navy instead of calling out the militia; but it was evidently intended by this act to provide for the two cases, the one of intervention in the affairs of a State when called on by the State for that purpose, and the power of executing the laws of Congress, which it is the duty of the President to do without application from any State. And in coupling the two cases, the sentences are so constructed that at first reading it might seem to imply that the President might use the Army and Navy whenever the laws of an individual State were obstructed; but a reading of the whole act shows that that is not its true construction. Let me read it again:

That in all cases of insurrection or obstruction to the laws, either of the United States, or of any individual State or Territory—

If the description of occasions for using the Army and Navy had stopped here, and the enacting clause commenced at that point, "it shall be lawful for him to employ the Army and Navy," &c., it would have been clear that Congress intended to confer authority to use the Army and Navy to enforce the laws of a State; but that is not the description. Let me read that whole description now:

That in all cases of insurrection or obstruction to the laws, either of the United States, or of any individual State or Territory, where it is lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia——

What does that mean? It relates back to the act of 1795, and says that in those cases of insurrection or obstruction of the laws where the President by that act is authorized to call out the militia, he may use the Army and Navy. I maintain that on a careful reading of this law it is perfectly clear that the President has no right to call forth the militia or to employ the Army and Navy for the mere purpose of executing the laws of a State.

Mr. MORTON. Did the Senator refer to the fourth section of the act of 1795?

Mr. CARPENTER. I did not; but I will stop and let you do it.

Mr. MORTON. I think the Senator is under a mistake.

Mr. CARPENTER. Well, what is it?

Mr. MORTON. That section reads:

In all cases of insurrection or obstruction to the laws—

Putting them together—

either of the United States, or of any individual State or Territory, where it is lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia for the purpose of suppressing such insurrection, it shall be lawful for him to employ for such purpose such part of the land or naval forces, &c.

That is the regular Army. I think that covers it.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is a good illustration of the value of these interruptions by the Senator from Indiana. I have read that act three times, and have been commenting upon it for ten minutes. The Senator from Indiana takes up another book—I suppose he has Brightly's Digest, in which the several acts relating to any one subject are arranged by sections—and reads the identical act that I read and have been commenting upon; and he says I have utterly overlooked that act, and it upsets everything I have said.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator said himself he had not read it, but would let me do it.

Mr. CARPENTER. It is true that when the Senator from Indiana asked me if I had not overlooked the fourth section of the act of 1795 I did not know but that there might be a mare's nest I had not found; but I knew if there was the Senator from Indiana would certainly be deep in it, and well qualified to point out its dimensions and locality. [Laughter.] I therefore stopped to hear what it was; but ascertained that instead of being the fourth section of the act of 1795, as the Senator supposed, it is an entire act, being the act of 1807, 2 Statutes at Large, 443, which I read in full, and have read three times in full, and have commented upon at length. The Senator now says that I have overlooked altogether the statute I am commenting upon. [Laughter.] I desire to say to the Senator that I take these interruptions very kindly, and I hope he will keep track of me, and as often as I overlook anything will call my attention to it.

Mr. MORTON. I understood the Senator to say that the President could not use the land and naval forces for that purpose, and I simply wanted to call his attention to the law. If the Senator is disposed to make a joke of it, I cannot help it; I have not the slightest objection to it.

Mr. CARPENTER. Well, Mr. President, I am not such a wit as to perpetrate such a joke as the Senator from Indiana has just made.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator's wit is more dangerous than his arguments generally.

Mr. CARPENTER. I had referred to the statute; I had referred to the page where it was to be found; I had read it three times; I was then proceeding and trying to satisfy the Senator from Indiana that it did not authorize the President to call out the troops to execute the laws of the State. The Senator from Indiana asked leave to interrupt me, and said I had overlooked the act I was commenting upon, and that it proved exactly what I am trying to prove it does not. That is all a perfectly legitimate argument for the Senator from Indiana to make. It is just as legitimate for me to make the argument that it does not give any such power, and that I was trying to do. The only difficulty about this matter is that it is impossible under the rules of the Senate for me to be enforcing one construction of the statute and the Senator from Indiana to be enforcing exactly the opposite construction at the same moment.

Let me turn again to this act. I say that for the whole act taken together it is manifest that it was not designed to add to the occasions upon which the President may employ force, but to authorize him to use the Army and Navy, instead of the militia, in cases already provided for. It refers in plain terms to two cases—one of insurrection against the government of a State where he was authorized to call out the militia; another of obstruction of the laws of the United States; and in providing for both cases in one section, an ambiguity was created in one part of the act, which is, however, entirely removed by the following additional descriptive phrase: "where it is lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia," &c.; that is to say, the act, taken entire, says that in both cases—the case of insurrection against a State, and the case of obstructing the laws of the United States; that is, in the cases where by law the President was then authorized to call out the militia—he might use the Army and Navy instead of the militia; and therefore, under this act of 1807, in order to ascertain whether the President is entitled in a given instance to use the Army and Navy, you must go back to the act of 1795 and ascertain whether it is a case within the provisions of that act, because unless it be it is not a case where it is lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia. All this act was intended to do was to authorize the use of the Army and Navy, instead of the more expensive force of the militia; but in terms the use of the Army and Navy is confined to the cases where by law the President was then authorized to call out the militia.

The first case arising under the act of 1795, as amended by the act of 1807, was the Rhode Island rebellion. That case fell precisely not only within the broad power conferred by the Constitution guaranteeing a State against "domestic violence," but within the much more restricted power conferred by Congress upon the President, to wit, a case of insurrection in any State against the government thereof. What were the facts of that case? The old charter government which had been in existence from the Revolution was going quietly on exercising its accustomed power, represented in the Senate, when some individuals took it into their heads to establish a new government. There was no warrant of law for their proceeding. The government of Rhode Island, which was one of the original members of the Union, one of the States which ratified our Constitution, had given no authority to anybody to establish another government. But voluntarily certain men called caucuses instead of legal conventions, and in the several towns and counties of that State they caused delegates to be elected to a convention which was nothing but a caucus, and that caucus framed a constitution and invited the people of Rhode Island to adopt the constitution they had framed at an election which they ordered; and subsequently they declared that the people of that State had adopted the new constitution; and then an election was held for officers under the new constitution, and Mr. Dorr was elected governor, as they said, and Mr. Dorr proceeded to make the fact manifest by assuming the duties of governor of the State under the new constitution. That was a clear case of insurrection against the State as soon as Mr. Dorr rallied a military force to put the new government into operation, because that was an attempt to overturn the legal government and set another in its place.

The Legislature of the legal government of Rhode Island represented to the President, not that there was domestic violence, but that there was insurrection in that State against the constituted authorities of the State, and called upon him to interfere. Subsequent to that, the governor himself wrote several communications of this kind, and the President did interfere; that is to say, he issued his proclamation, as the law requires that he shall in such a case, commanding the insurgents in arms against the charter government to disperse and go to their homes within so many days. That is what the President did in that case; and for this I refer the Senator who wishes to examine it to the document which was published by the House of Representatives upon the Rhode Island troubles, at page 673, and the President's proclamation, printed in the same book, at page 684, with all the correspondence which took place upon the subject, showing how carefully President Tyler observed his duty, and how cautiously he proceeded, sending out his agents to examine; and then the governor, having forgotten that the Legislature had convened, and standing on his former request, the President writes to inform him that he has fallen into an error, and that, the Legislature being in session, they must make the application—all showing what care the President took to keep within the provisions of the Constitution and act.

That was the only instance in which this power had been exercised until the present case. Now I want to call your attention, Mr. President, to the case upon which, in the summer of 1873, the President issued a proclamation. But before coming to that let me say that until the 15th of January, 1873, when Mr. Pinchback was elected, there had been no recognition by the President of governor or Legislature, unless the telegram of December 12, 1872, from the Attorney-General to Acting Governor Pinchback can be so regarded; and that I deny. The Senator from Indiana argues that we are estopped from inquiring into the legality of the Kellogg Legislature for various reasons, one of which is that the President has recognized that Legislature which he claims to result from the telegram last mentioned. A judge on the bench has jurisdiction, under certain circumstances, to decide a question of title between my friend from New York and myself to a farm; but suppose he hears a rumor that my friend and myself are contending about that matter, and he directs his clerk to telegraph to the Senator from New York, "My dear Senator, let it be understood that I decide in favor of your right to this farm and that the pertinacious and obstreperous Senator from Wisconsin had better hide his head;" would that telegram preclude my rights or estop me from litigating the question?

Under the carefully worded provisions of the act, the President must be informed by application from the State authorities that an insurrection exists against such State government, and then he must issue a proclamation to the insurgents which gives notice to all the world of the action he is about to take; and why does that amount to a recognition? Simply because the President having been called upon, and a proper case made, it becomes his duty to put down those who are in arms against the legal government. Therefore the determination on his part of which is the legal government is a determination of a matter as to which he has jurisdiction to decide, and differs from the telegram sent by the Attorney-General to Governor Pinchback, as a judgment of a judge in a case properly before him between my friend from New York and myself would differ from a telegram sent by the judge to my friend, as before supposed; and I maintain that in no other way than by the proceedings prescribed by the act can the President effectually recognize any State government.

Will the Senator from Indiana seriously maintain that the President can telegraph to different States, "I recognize you as governor of such a State," and "I recognize you as the Legislature of such a State," with no case made calling upon him to act under the law? Have we come to that in this country? No, sir; we have not. And I maintain that when a proper case is made, the President can proceed only in pursuance of the act, and can in no other way accomplish a recognition of a State government which would bind anybody.

The President of the United States is charged with a most delicate and important duty. When an application is made to him in proper form, and showing the proper case, he must march with the Army and Navy and restore order; but he must have the proper case before he does so.

Now let us see what was the case as made by Governor Kellogg. I sent the other day to the Attorney-General for a copy of the communication from Louisiana upon which the President issued his proclamation of May 23, 1873. It is in the following words:

STATE OF LOUISIANA, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
New Orleans, May 13, 1873.

SIR: Domestic violence existing in several parishes of this State, which the State authorities are unable to suppress without great expense and danger of bloodshed, and the Legislature not being in session, and it being impossible to convene the Legislature in time to meet the emergency, I respectfully make application, under the fourth section of article 4 of the Constitution of the United States, for a sufficient military force of the United States Government to enable the State authorities to suppress insurrection and domestic violence.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM P. KELLOGG,
Governor of Louisiana.

To his Excellency U. S. GRANT, President United States.

The word "insurrection" appears but once in this communication, and that not in the statement of facts, but in the prayer for relief. He states the case as follows:

Domestic violence existing in several parishes of this State, which the State authorities are unable to suppress without great expense and danger of bloodshed.

I turn to the proclamation which was issued by the President, and which I think shows conclusively that whoever drafted it had never seen Mr. Kellogg's application. The Senator from Indiana read this proclamation, and I read it from the report of his speech. This is his estoppel on the Senate to inquire whether Pinchback was elected by a Legislature or by a town meeting:

Whereas under the pretense that William P. Kellogg, the present executive of Louisiana, and the officers associated with him in the State administration, were not duly elected, certain turbulent and disorderly persons have combined together, with force and arms, to resist the laws and constituted authorities of said State; and whereas it has been duly certified by the proper local authorities, and judicially determined by the inferior and supreme courts of said State that said officers are entitled to hold their offices respectively, and to execute and discharge the functions thereof—and whereas Congress, at its late session, upon a due consideration of the subject, tacitly recognized the said executive and his associates then, as now, in office, by refusing to take any action with respect thereto——

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] and his associates voted against a new election, because they thought McEnery was the governor and he and his legislature formed the government of that State; others voted the same way because they thought Kellogg was the governor; and the bill was defeated by the joint action of the democratic party, holding that McEnery was elected, and a portion of the republicans, who were of the opinion that Mr. Kellogg was elected. The bill passed, as you know, in the late hours of the morning.

Mr. MORTON. It did not pass; it died.

Mr. CARPENTER. Yes, it passed away; and therefore we have had all these difficulties. We have had this bogus government standing now nearly a year, passing laws under which men have been acting, under which rights are supposed to have been vested. We have had bloodshed, and tumult, and riot, all, in my judgment, the legitimate fruit of the non-action of Congress when it ought to have acted, and when, in my judgment, it would have acted but for the circumstances under which the bill was brought before the Senate. It came here in the very last days of the session, when all the accumulation of business for six months was crowding upon us, and when but a short time could be devoted to any one subject, and we sat here all night long to consider this bill. My belief is that the bill could have been passed at midnight, at one o'clock, at two o'clock; but by three some of the oldest Senators, and one or two who were in poor health, had left, could not remain longer; and so it ran on until four o'clock, when the vote would have been decidedly against the bill. I recollect that at that time some debate was started of a political nature, which drew, I think, the late Senator from California, Mr. Casserly, to his feet; and that delayed a vote until we could send for Senators; and when the count came it turned out that there was a majority of two against passing the bill.

Mr. MORTON. That was the trouble exactly.

Mr. CARPENTER. That was the trouble; and let me say to the Senator from Indiana it was trouble indeed. It has been trouble to that State; it is trouble to this country; it is a cloud upon the fair name of our nation.

But let me return to the proclamation:

And whereas it is provided in the Constitution of the United States that the United States shall protect every State in this Union, on application of the Legislature, or of the executive when the Legislature cannot be convened, against domestic violence; and whereas it is provided in the laws of the United States that in all cases of insurrection in any State, or of obstruction to the laws thereof, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the executive when the Legislature cannot be convened, to call forth the militia of any other State or States, or to employ such part of the land and naval forces as shall be judged necessary for the purpose of suppressing such insurrection, or causing the laws to be duly executed.

This recital shows that whoever drafted this proclamation had mistaken the effect of the act of 1807, and concluded that it authorized the President to enforce State laws, which I hold not to be the case, unless the obstruction of the laws of the State amounts to an insurrection against the government of the State. I will not take time further to consider the recitals of the proclamation. I have read enough to show their incorrectness and insufficiency to justify Federal interference.

Mr. MORTON. Do I understand the Senator to say that that proclamation was issued in violation of law? Is that his point?

Mr. CARPENTER. Well, Mr. President, if I cannot make my points I am certain the Senator from Indiana cannot make them for me, for he does not understand what I am trying to do half as well as I do myself. If he thinks I am making a very weak speech on this subject it need not distress him at all; he can enjoy that fact; and if I am not making my points he certainly does not want to help me make them. If I was conscious that I was failing to establish any point here I certainly would not go to that Senator for help about it.

Mr. MORTON. I asked a very plain question.

Mr. CARPENTER. What was the question?

Mr. MORTON. Does the Senator insist that that proclamation was issued in violation of law? I want an answer to that question.

Mr. CARPENTER. I understand perfectly well the motive of putting that question, and I am just as free to answer it as I am to tell the truth about anything else. I do not say it was issued in violation of any act, because no act forbids it to be issued. I say it was issued without any authority of law. There was no case made before the President which authorized him to interfere. Nothing was shown to him establishing the fact that there was an insurrection in that State against the government of the State. The case made is "domestic violence." The President does not know anything about domestic violence. That is not a call that brings him to his feet. That might bring Congress into action; there might simply be a riot there, or other disturbance, not directed against the State government, and under the power which the Constitution confers upon us, perhaps we could order the Army there to suppress it. I do not say whether we could or could not, but I do say that the President could not. He must have a case, not of domestic violence, but a case of insurrection in a State against the government thereof; and I say no such case was shown. Therefore I say there was no authority for issuing that proclamation.

No one questions that the proclamation was issued in good faith. No one questions that in the attitude in which affairs were left by Congress omitting to act upon the subject, the proclamation did good. I have no doubt that issuing the proclamation did stay the effusion of blood in that State. I have no doubt that but for that proclamation these factions would have fought it out among themselves and settled it one way or the other, to the shame of our civilization; and I do not regret that the President took the responsibility of issuing that proclamation. But I am discussing here its technical validity and effect. The Senator from Indiana pleads, as an estoppel to the right of the Senate to inquire into the fact, that the President, in a case made before him, has determined that Mr. Kellogg and his legislature constitute the government of that State. Now, I answer in the first place on the question of fact, that he never has recognized the Legislature of that State. That telegram from the Attorney-General I throw out of the case as worthy of no consideration whatever. In the proclamation nothing is said about the Legislature. The President paid no attention to the Legislature when they called upon him. The act of the President was based on this application made by Mr. Kellogg as governor of the State, and all that can be claimed on the question of fact is, that the President recognized the governor when he recognized his authority to make this application; but standing here technically, answering the Senator's technical plea of estoppel by which he proposes to prevent our inquiring into the fact, I meet him with the technicality pertaining to such a plea, and I say that, standing upon the strict letter of the law, there was no authority for that proclamation. It therefore has no validity as an estoppel.

There is another matter worthy of consideration at this point. The President of the United States, in the closing days of the last session, sent us a message laying the responsibility of this business upon our shoulders, and telling us what he had done, and saying that if Congress did not act in the premises he would be compelled to uphold the Kellogg government. The President acted in perfect good faith to Congress. Congress failed to pass any act.

O, Mr. President, I just begin to see, I think, the drift of the Senator's interruptions. The truth is, that while I am not a very good lawyer, I am no politician at all; and, being engaged here in the discussion of a dry legal question, it just occurs to me that the Senator from Indiana is lying in wait for me in the forum of politics. What in a strict legal sense may be the effect of the proclamation as an estoppel upon the Senate is one thing, and what may be said in popular speech about the propriety or impropriety of the President's course is a very different question. The Senator has less taste for the dusty paths of professional discussion than for the greener fields and sunnier skies of the domain of politics; and he is apparently laboring to have it appear that I am abusing the President. But, sir, in this he will fail. I claim to be a true friend of the President; and I am his friend and admirer for the reason, among others, that he not only tolerates but desires the fullest examination of his official acts, and does not expect his friends to approve what they think erroneous. It is one thing to say that Kellogg's letter did not make a case which could justify the interference of the President under the act of 1795, and quite another to say that furnishing troops to execute the mandates of the courts was unjustifiable.

If I were on the stump and some democrat were abusing the President of the United States, the defense would be easy. The President of the United States being compelled by the Constitution to execute the laws, and ascertaining that the Federal courts there had made a certain decision and issued a certain order the validity of which he had no right to question, properly enough stationed troops to execute it. All that he actually did may be defended upon that ground. Indeed, the issuing of this proclamation harmed no one. All the troops that are in Louisiana to-day were there before the proclamation issued. They were there as a posse to enforce the decrees of the court, and they were properly there for that purpose. They merely executed the decrees of the court, and that is the defense of the President politically. But that does not enable the Senator from Indiana to estop the Senate on this inquiry as to whether Mr. Pinchback was elected by a Legislature or not. The Senator from Indiana does not seek to rest the defense of the President upon the true ground, but seeks to interpose a technicality, and says that, because the President has issued a proclamation, our mouths are closed; and while I am discussing this legal question he aims to give the discussion a political direction, and raise a partisan clamor around my ears. But I trust that the Senate will distinguish between that kind of justification which a generous people will always accord a faithful and honest President for acts well intended though not within the letter of the law, and that technical justification which would be held valid in a court of law if the officers acting under his orders were sued for trespass.

But let us dwell a moment upon this subject, because it is an important one, and, from a remark or two which has fallen from the Senator while I have had the floor, I fear that he and I do not think entirely alike about it.

Mr. MORTON. This is trifling.

Mr. CARPENTER. If I should speak forever I could not satisfy the Senator on this Louisiana question. I have no hope of ever being able to do so. He says the subject is a very trifling one.

Mr. MORTON. No; I said from the character of your remarks it must be a very trifling subject.

Mr. CARPENTER. Therefore my remarks are very trifling! Well, they are sufficient for my purpose; and I announced in the outset that it was not my purpose to make a speech; I have no ambition in that direction at all; but I will try to make as many Senators as will listen to me understand, in the first place, just what the facts of this case are, and second, that the Senator from Indiana has a theory about it that is entirely unsound.

Now let us see what there is in this doctrine of our being estopped to inquire into the status of that Legislature which elected Mr. Pinchback. The Senator says that because the President issued this proclamation recognizing that Legislature we are precluded from this inquiry. In the first place, one complete answer is that the Constitution of the United States provides that each House shall be the exclusive judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. Neither House, nor both, can abdicate that power. The Constitution vests it in this body. No power on earth can divest it. No man will dispute that in determining upon the election of a Senator we must inquire as to two things: First. Was the body of men which pretended to elect the Legislature the law-making power of the State? Second. Did that body in fact choose? We cannot judge of the election of a Senator without determining both of these questions. The Constitution having laid that duty upon us, if the acts to which I have referred of 1795 and 1807 have the effect which is claimed for them by the Senator from Indiana, and have stripped us of the power of inquiring into that fact, then they are unconstitutional; because no act of Congress can take from us the power which the Constitution in express words vests in us. But, in the next place, conceding that the acts are constitutional, which they undoubtedly are when properly construed, such results would not follow, because in this case there has been no decision of the President upon the subject which can estop our inquiring into it.

The Senator from Indiana has referred at great length to the decision of Luther vs. Borden. That case will always be a subject of dispute. Before reading the passages of the opinion which the Senator relies upon, I wish to read a few words from Chief Justice Marshall. In the trial of Aaron Burr, when the decision in Bollman and Swartwout's case was handed up by the bar and was claimed to conflict with what the Chief Justice was holding in the case at bar, the Chief Justice disposed of it with this remark:

> Every opinion, to be correctly understood, ought to be considered with a view to the case in which it was delivered. In the case of the United States against Bollman and Swartwout, there was no evidence that even two men had ever met for the purpose of executing the plan in which those persons were charged with having participated. It was, therefore, sufficient for the court to say, that unless men were assembled, war could not be levied. That case was decided by this declaration. The court might, indeed, have defined the species of assemblage which would amount to levying of war; but as this opinion was not a treatise on treason, but a decision of a particular case, expressions of doubtful import should be construed in reference to the case itself; and the mere omission to state that a particular circumstance was necessary to the consummation of the crime ought not to be construed into a declaration that the circumstance was unimportant. General expressions ought not to be considered as overruling settled principles without a direct declaration to that effect. (Burr's Trial, 1807, Robertson, volume 2, page 415.)

Let us turn for a moment to the case of Luther vs. Borden. In the first place, it was an action of trespass quare clausum fregit. The defendant pleaded that he was in the employment of the government of Rhode Island as a soldier, and that the breaking into the plaintiff's house was by direction of his superior officer, the State being under martial law in consequence of a rebellion. To this it was replied that this pretended government was no government, &c., and that made the issue in the case. It came before the Supreme Court from the circuit court of the United States for that district. The Chief Justice, in this celebrated opinion, after stating the facts of the case and the issue, proceeds as follows:

When the decision of this court might lead to such results—

That is to say, if they were to overturn the government on this plea it would unsettle rights of property, &c.—

When the decision of this court might lead to such results, it becomes its duty to examine very carefully its own powers before it undertakes to exercise jurisdiction.

Certainly, the question which the plaintiff proposed to raise by the testimony he offered has not heretofore been recognized as a judicial one in any of the State courts. In forming the constitutions of the different States after the Declaration of Independence, and in the various changes and alterations which have since been made, the political department has always determined whether the proposed Constitution or amendment was ratified or not by the people of the State, and the judicial power has followed its decision. In Rhode Island the question has been directly decided. Prosecutions were there instituted against some of the persons who had been active in the forcible opposition to the old government. And in more than one of the cases evidence was offered on the part of the defense similar to the testimony offered in the circuit court—

That is, for the purpose of showing that the proposed constitution had been adopted, &c.—

but the courts uniformly held that the inquiry proposed to be made belonged to the political power and not to the judicial.

Mark here, for the purpose of understanding the scope of the opinion, what the Chief Justice was discussing. He was showing that this question could never be decided in a court, because it was not of a judicial character—it was in its nature political; no judicial court could decide it. That was the point. He says that in all cases since the Revolution it has been for the political department to determine whether a constitution or an amendment to a constitution had been adopted.

But the courts uniformly held that the inquiry proposed to be made belonged to the political power and not to the judicial; that it rested within the political power to decide whether the charter government had been displaced or not; and when that decision was made, the judicial department would be bound to take notice of it as the paramount law of the State, without the aid of oral evidence or the examination of witnesses; that, according to the laws and institutions of Rhode Island, no change had been recognized by the political power; and that the charter government was the lawful and established government of the State during the period in contest, and that those who were in arms against it were insurgents and liable to punishment. This doctrine is clearly and forcibly stated in the opinion of the supreme court of the State in the trial of Thomas W. Dorr, who was the governor elected under the opposing constitution, and headed the armed force which endeavored to maintain its authority.

Indeed, we do not see how the question could be tried and judicially decided in a State court.

Not only could the Federal courts not try the question, but "indeed we do not see how the question could be tried and judicially decided in a State court."

Judicial power presupposes an established government, capable of enacting laws and enforcing their execution and of appointing judges to expound and administer them. The acceptance of the judicial office is a recognition of the authority of the government from which it is derived. And if the authority of that government is annulled and overthrown, the power of its courts and other officers is annulled with it. And if a State court should enter upon the inquiry proposed in this case, and should come to the conclusion that the government under which it acted had been put aside and displaced by an opposing government, it would cease to be a court, and be incapable of pronouncing a judicial decision upon the question it undertook to try. If it decides at all as a court, it necessarily affirms the existence and authority of the government under which it is exercising judicial power.

That single remark disposes of all that the Senator says about the binding effect of the decisions in the State of Louisiana. I will show, before I get through, that in point of fact those courts have decided that they have no jurisdiction to inquire into it for another reason; they cannot even in the case of a parish officer go back of the returns made by the returning board and the issue of a commission. They say they have no jurisdiction to inquire into the fact of election. But, entirely apart from that objection, the broad ground that whether there was a government in Louisiana or not is not a judicial but a political question disposes of all the decisions; that is, the opinions pronounced by the judges of the court on that subject.

I pass a portion of the opinion, and start again on page 10 of 7 Howard:

Moreover, the Constitution of the United States, as far as it has provided for an emergency of this kind and authorized the General Government to interfere in the domestic concerns of a State, has treated the subject as political in its nature, and placed the power in the hands of that department.

The fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States provides that "the United States shall guarantee to every State in the Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and on the application of the Legislature, or of the executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence."

Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State.

Before reading further in this opinion let me remind the Senate of one of the points made by the Senator from Indiana, that we were estopped from inquiring into this subject as a Senate in consequence of the President's recognition. Although he conceded that the two Houses of Congress could reverse that decision by passing a law overthrowing the government, and nothing else could, he insisted that we as a Senate were estopped, and the House as a House were estopped, from inquiring into the subject. Bearing that in mind, let us see what the Chief Justice says:

Under this article of the Constitution it rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State. For as the United States guarantee to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can determine whether it is republican or not.

Now, mark:

And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority. And its decision—

That is, the decision of Congress—is binding on every other department of the Government, and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal.

This is the point to which I wish to call the special attention of the Senator from Indiana. The Chief Justice here was speaking of a case where the President had interfered, the case of an insurrection against the government of a State, where the call was proper, where the proclamation had issued, and the consequence of that interference was under discussion. The judge says:

It is true that the contest in this case did not last long enough to bring the matter to this issue—

That is to say, to bring the matter into Congress to be tried—and as no Senators or Representatives were elected under the authority of the government of which Mr. Dorr was the head, Congress was not called upon to decide the controversy. Yet the right to decide is placed there, and not in the courts.

Now, let us see how sound the Senator's proposition is, that the action of the President estops us—and he read this decision to prove it. The court, in words, say that it is for Congress alone to determine this question, and that when they do determine it they bind every other department of the Government. The Senator from Indiana has completely reversed the order of precedence as to authority.

The Supreme Court in this opinion decide that this is a question which the courts cannot decide, but as to which the courts must follow the decision of Congress; that no court, Federal or State, can decide it, because the question is political and not judicial. The Senator maintains that the courts of the State have decided it, and therefore we are estopped to inquire into it. Again, the court holds that when Congress passes upon the question it is settled by "the proper constitutional authority, and its decision is binding on every other department of the Government." The Senator maintains that the President has decided the question, and therefore Congress cannot; that is, the Senate cannot, the House cannot. That there may be no chance for the Senator to escape from the conflict between his views and the doctrine of this decision by saying that he has admitted that Congress may by a law overthrow the government the President has established, let me call your attention particularly to what he said upon this point. Speaking of the President, he says:

He has made the decision, empowered thereto by an act of Congress; and the court well say, after he has exercised that power, shall a circuit court of the United States inquire whether he has done it properly? And now I inquire of Senators, is it for the Senate alone to ask the question whether he has made that decision properly? If I concede, for the sake of the argument, that both Houses of Congress by a bill may overrule that decision, I submit that neither House acting by itself has the right to do it.

And again, he says:

And now I ask, has the Senate of the United States the right to decide that he is not the governor of Louisiana, and thus to overrule the action of the President to which he has been authorized by an act of Congress? I say no; that while both Houses, by a law, acting under the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution, may declare what is the lawful government of Louisiana, it is not competent for either House, acting separately, to overrule the decision of the President of the United States in this matter. The fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution declares that the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government. We have exercised that power in regard to the States which were involved in the rebellion. Their case presented the first and the highest ground for the exercise of that great power which was known to the history of this Government. But how was it to be exercised? Exercised by both Houses in the form of a law, to be submitted to the President of the United States for his approval or rejection, not to be exercised by one House alone in any form whatever.

Here the Senator asserts that the Houses cannot separately decide anything about this matter after the decision of the President is made.

Now let us see what the court say:

And when the Senators and Representatives of a State are admitted into the councils of the Union, the authority of the government under which they are appointed, as well as its republican character, is recognized by the proper constitutional authority.

And speaking of the government of Mr. Dorr, which in that case the President had overthrown, the court add:

It is true that the contest in this case did not last long enough to bring this matter to this issue; and as no Senators or Representatives were elected under the government of which Mr. Dorr was the head, Congress was not called upon to decide the controversy. Yet the right to decide is placed there and not in the courts.

Here the court in words hold that, if the Dorr government, which was overthrown by the decision of the President, had subsequently sent Senators and Representatives to Congress, Congress would have been compelled to decide the whole question by deciding whether or not they should be admitted. Well, sir, how would that have been determined? By the two Houses passing a law? No, sir; no such law could have been passed. The Senate would have decided whether to seat the Senators, and the House as to Representatives. Yet the Senator from Indiana reads this opinion to sustain his proposition that the Houses of Congress separately could, in such case, decide nothing.

Again, the Senator quotes from this decision, which declares that this question is political, and therefore cannot be determined in a judicial court, and then triumphantly asks whether the Senate has any jurisdiction in the premises. His logic is this: Because Congress must, and the courts cannot, decide the question, therefore the Senate can make no decision. This exactly reverses the doctrine of the court in Luther vs. Borden which the Senator cites to sustain his proposition.

Why, sir, in all this business of putting down an insurrection in a State the President is but the mere agent of Congress. Was it supposed by our fathers, or if we were sitting to-day to frame a Constitution and were discussing the form in which this power ought to be conferred in the Constitution, would we think that the complicated questions involved in such a case ought to be settled by the sword? Would that be the method of decision? No; we would say just what the Constitution does say, that where an insurrection arises, where there is a contest between two factions claiming to be the government, and it has swollen to the dimensions of an insurrection, and one party is arrayed against the other, one party being the legal government and the other not, in that case the President shall restore order. It does not matter much whether he sets up the right party or the wrong party; he will bring about a condition of things where the matter can be discussed and considered; he will settle the insurrection; and when the government which he has set up or overthrown—to use the language of the great Chief Justice—sends its Senators and Representatives to Congress, then the issue can be settled by the two Houses determining separately who are entitled to seats. This is not only the doctrine of this decision, but it is the plainest teaching of prudence. To send a military force to settle all the questions that arise in this Louisiana difficulty and call that one of the processes of a civilized government for settling such questions would be simply monstrous.

There are other parts of the opinion in Luther vs. Borden which ought to be considered in this connection. I shall read one or two passages, but shall not consume time in commenting upon them. The court says:

> So, too, as relates to the clause in the above-mentioned article of the Constitution, providing for cases of domestic violence. It rested with Congress, too, to determine upon the means proper to be adopted to fulfill this guarantee. They might, if they had deemed it most advisable to do so, have placed it in the power of a court to decide when the contingency had happened which required the Federal Government to interfere. But Congress thought otherwise, and no doubt wisely; and by the act of February 28, 1795, provided that, "in case of an insurrection in any State against the government thereof, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on application of the Legislature of such State, or of the executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) to call forth such number of the militia of any other State or States as may be applied for, as he may judge sufficient to suppress such insurrection."
> By this act, the power of deciding whether the exigency had arisen upon which the Government of the United is bound to interfere is given to the President. He is to act upon the application of the Legislature or of the executive, and consequently he must determine what body of men constitute the Legislature, and who is the governor, before he can act. The fact that both parties claim the right to the government cannot alter the case, for both cannot be entitled to it. If there is an armed conflict, like the one of which we are speaking—

That is, an armed conflict of one government trying to displace another, the case of an insurrection against the State—> it is a case of domestic violence, and one of the parties must be in insurrection against the lawful government. And the President must, of necessity, decide which is the government, and which party is unlawfully arrayed against it, before he can perform the duty imposed upon him by the act of Congress.

Then going on further with the doctrine on this subject and meeting the argument that the President might act corruptly or fall into mistakes about it, the court says this:

> Undoubtedly, if the President, in exercising this power, shall fall into error or invade the rights of the people of the State, it would be in the power of Congress to apply the proper remedy. But the courts must administer the law as they find it.

Now I assert that there is not one single sentence of that opinion which, considered with reference to the context and the facts of the case before the court, gives the slightest color to the idea that the President's interfering can bind us in a case like the one we are now engaged in. Let us see how it would bind us. To a certain extent it would bind all the world where he had interfered properly. For instance, he sends troops to arrest a man. No court could release that man; Congress could not treat the arrest as illegal, because, the proper case being made, the President has acted within the scope of his authority, and so far it binds everybody. As to whether this man should be held a prisoner, as to whether this town should be bombarded or or besieged—on any of these questions his determination is our determination, because for that purpose we have made him our agent; and when he decides, he decides for us in our name, and it is our decision, and so far it binds us, and binds the court, and binds everybody. But when, months afterward, peace is restored, and the question is whether the President erred or not in the selection of the government to be sustained, then the Chief Justice says the question will come before Congress on the application of the Senators and Representatives of the State for admission.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question at that point?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator, I believe, admits that in a proper case the recognition by the President of one government is the act of the Government of the United States, because it is made in pursuance of law.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is admitted.

Mr. MORTON. Now, suppose we admit Senators here who are commissioned by the McEnery government, and the other House admits members who are commissioned by Kellogg, what is the condition of things?

Mr. CARPENTER. I should think it would be mixed. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORTON. I should think so, and the Senator says it is lawful to mix it in that way,

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not see how you can help yourself. Suppose the thing did happen to-day, what are you going to do about it? Suppose we seat McMillen here from the McEnery government; suppose that the House of Representatives seat men coming from the Kellogg government, and suppose the President recognizes a third party—what are you going to do about it?

Mr. MORTON. What condition does that leave Louisiana in?

Mr. CARPENTER. The truth is it all comes to this: you can regulate these commotions that happen in a State by civil authority up to a certain point. Beyond a certain point they swell out of the limits within which they can be controlled by peaceful means; they swell beyond the power of the Senate to control, beyond the power of the House to control, and then it becomes a case again of original, downright fighting, and the strongest party will be in the ascendant. Your courts can go a pace; Congress can go a distance still further; but these commotions may come to a point where the fighting has got to come and settle it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask my friend a question?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the case he has last supposed, or my friend from Indiana supposed, of the House deciding that the Kellogg Representatives are the true ones, and so recognizing the Kellogg government, and the Senate deciding that the McEnery Senators are the true ones, and so recognizing the McEnery government, then my friend says the case is mixed. So it is; but is not that one of the cases which he has named as going beyond the power of the Senate or of the House separately in acting upon its own special privileges, and does it not then become a case for the legislative action of the Government, which declares that the Congress—which means the two Houses together, with the approval of the President—are to interfere and settle the dispute?

Mr. MORTON. The Senator from Wisconsin says it comes to fighting when it gets to that point.

Mr. CARPENTER. The trouble is that the Senator from Indiana has been up to the fighting point for about two hours, and he is courting a fight at every point. At the end of every paragraph that I have uttered I have met the Senator's question as I thought it deserved. But to be serious, I concur with the suggestion made by the question of the Senator from Vermont.

In a case where the Senate should seat Senators from one government, and the House from another, in the same State, and in many other cases which might arise, it is easier to suggest than solve the difficulty; and those cases may properly be left until they arise.

I am not certain that the House of Representatives might not seat members who had received a majority of the legal votes in their respective districts, although the State government should be conceded to be overthrown. The election of members of that House depends upon the votes of the people in districts which Congress may establish. It is otherwise with the election of Senators; they represent the organized State, the corporation. And if there be no State government there can certainly be no election of a Senator. But, without attempting to solve questions which have not yet arisen, let me come back to the line of remark which I had prescribed for myself.

The Senator from Indiana claims that Mr. Pinchback should be seated as Senator from that State, first, upon the ground of what he calls the prima facie case. Here I desire to call the attention of the Senate to what escaped me yesterday, when speaking on this part of the case. I need not spend much time in discussing this prima facie case, because the Senator from Indiana has gone back on it himself. The Senator from Indiana in his remarks said—I read from the report of his speech:

> The first question, therefore, that I submit to the Senate upon this prima facie case is: Was Governor Kellogg the governor of the State of Louisiana at the time these credentials were signed? If he was, that is the end of this argument; we need proceed no further. If we hold that he was the governor of Louisiana at that time in contemplation of law as well as fact, then we need proceed no further in the argument so far as this resolution is concerned, because he certifies that Mr. Pinchback was elected a member of this body, in conformity to law, by the Legislature of Louisiana.

And yet, Mr. President, you will bear in mind that on a later day, several days ago, the Senator from Indiana gave notice of a motion to recommit this matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, in consequence, he said, of rumors that had reached his ears about the circumstances under which Mr. Pinchback was elected. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] reminds me that the Senator from Indiana has already substituted that for his original resolution. Then the Senator from Indiana stands here asserting, first, that on the prima facie case, to wit, the credentials signed by Governor Kellogg, we have no right to inquire any further; and yet he stands here moving that this matter be referred to the committee for the purpose of further inquiry. If there were any improper circumstances about Pinchback's election, if he was elected by fraud or bribery, conceding the Legislature to have been qualified to elect, then, the prima facie case existing, he is to be seated, and that matter is to be discussed subsequently; and yet the Senator from Indiana has gone directly back upon his own proposition and moved to recommit this whole subject to the committee. Mr. Pinchback may have been elected by fraud or bribery, and yet if he was in fact elected by a legal body, and his credentials are in due form, both according to the principles laid down by the Senator himself and the uniform practice of the Senate, he is entitled to his seat. Why does the Senator withdraw from his position in regard to the prima facie case? He must believe that there is some doubt as to whether this man has been elected by a Legislature authorized to elect, or he must have some doubt whether Kellogg is governor, or he would not have made a motion to recommit this subject to the committee.

Mr. MORTON. Does the Senator think that the argument he is now making is legitimate? The Senator certainly understood the circumstances under which I made the motion and the purpose for which I made it; and my remarks, which he has before him, explain how I came to offer that resolution; why I felt constrained to offer it. I felt that I had no right to conceal that knowledge from the Senate; that that would be to undertake to determine myself the question that it should not be investigated until after he was admitted, and I felt constrained to give the Senate an opportunity of passing upon that question. I offered the resolution for that purpose, and I knew of no other way of getting it before the Senate. That is all in my remarks.

Mr. CARPENTER. I trust the Senator from Indiana does not understand me as disapproving of that motion. I am commending him. He has made an argument here stronger than I could make against what he calls his prima facie case. He has overthrown it by his own motion. It was waste of time for him to ask us if it did not estop us when he has himself shown that it did not, by moving to refer it to the committee. I say he has done right in making this motion.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator speaks of my motion as being inconsistent with my former argument. I explained fully how I came to make it. It was for the purpose of giving the Senate an opportunity of passing upon that question in connection with the other questions—whether they would investigate first and seat afterward, or seat first and investigate afterward; and my remarks there show it, so that the Senator's argument is neither fair nor legitimate.

Mr. CARPENTER. Well, let us go slow about this matter. I think I shall prove that it is both fair and legitimate. Let me refer now to the Senator's speech made here on the 16th of December, and see what he said about it then:

> The first proposition that I present on the resolution that I have offered is that Mr. Pinchback is entitled, upon his credentials, to be sworn in and take his seat as a member of this body; that he presents what is called a prima facie case, and upon that case he is entitled to be sworn in; and if there are grounds of contest, either because he was not elected by the right Legislature, or was elected by fraud or bribery, or that there was not a quorum of the two houses present, or that he was not elected in conformity to the act of Congress of 1866, those grounds of contest can only be urged after he has been sworn in and taken his seat, and cannot be brought forward now as a reason why he should be kept out of his seat until after those questions have been decided.

That is the language of the Senator from Indiana. He said if Pinchback had a prima facie case—and he had one if Kellogg was governor—that ended the question, and the investigation of every other objection to Mr. Pinchback must be postponed until he was sworn in and became a member of this body. How has the case changed? Not at all. Is not Kellogg governor now as much as he was on the 16th of last month? Is not Pinchback's prima facie case as good now as it was then? And yet the Senator says that out of respect to the Senate he has been constrained to move to send this case back, to investigate the very questions which on the 16th of December he said could not be investigated until after he had taken his seat. I was referring to that to show that the Senator's subsequent conduct in this case answered his own argument. Now he appeals to me and says, "Is it fair or is it legitimate for you to say that I have acted inconsistently in my speech?" I remember that on one occasion, when I had read from a speech a certain Senator had made two years before in this body, the late Senator from Illinois, Mr. Trumbull, came to me and said, "You are a young Senator here; perhaps you do not know one thing." Said I, "Very likely; what is it?" Said he, "It is an established rule in this body, as among gentlemen, that nobody shall refer to the Congressional Globe of more than two years previous." [Laughter.] But I supposed I could refer to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD one month back. I supposed I could refer to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which contains the Senator's speech on this very resolution which we are now considering, in which the Senator from Indiana, in plain words, says the seating of Mr. Pinchback involves no question but whether Kellogg is governor; and if he was elected by fraud or by bribery—those matters must be investigated subsequently. I referred to that to show that the Senator's speech could not be sound, because he had disregarded it himself.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him right there?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. To show how eminently unfair that is, although I do not care anything about it——

Mr. CARPENTER. If you do not care anything about it, let me finish. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORTON. No; let me go on; you said you would allow me to do so.

When I offered this last resolution I recapitulated the argument I had made before; I took nothing back; I have not taken anything back; but I explained the introduction of this resolution about the examination of Mr. Pinchback's personal conduct because that was a thing that had not been before the Senate before, and I used this language:

> Now, Mr. President, within a few days, and since that time, information has come to me of a character that I was not at liberty to overlook or pass by; in effect charging Mr. Pinchback with improper conduct in connection with his election; which charges, if true, would, in my opinion, render it improper for him to have a seat upon this floor. Having due regard to my honor as a Senator, as the chairman of the committee charged with such investigations, and my duty to the Senate, I did not feel at liberty to withhold that information from the Senate and proceed with the original resolution asking Mr. Pinchback to be seated. To have withheld that information from the Senate would have been an assumption upon my part of the right to determine the question that Mr. Pinchback should first be seated and the investigation made afterward. I thought I had no right myself to determine that question, and that it was my duty to bring it before the Senate and devolve upon the Senate the responsibility in regard to that question, as well as in regard to others, whether the Senate would seat Mr. Pinchback first and investigate him afterward, or would first investigate him and determine whether he was entitled to be seated afterward. I knew of no way of placing myself, and of getting that question properly before the Senate, than by making the motion which I now send to the Chair.

It was not inconsistent with my former position, but to place the whole matter before the Senate, and I knew of no other way of doing it. When the first resolution was offered, this matter in regard to Mr. Pinchback's own conduct in connection with his election was not a matter within my knowledge, nor was it embraced in the original limits of the discussion. Therefore, in duty to myself and in duty to the Senate, I felt bound to place the whole matter before the Senate before the subject was acted upon. I do not care what more you say about it.

Mr. CARPENTER. Evidently the Senator does not, and evidently he does not care much what he said himself about it. [Laughter.]

I refer again to this proposition. The Senator from Indiana, on the 16th day of December, laid down this proposition, that if Mr. Kellogg was governor of the State, Mr. Pinchback was entitled to his seat, and we could inquire into no other question. He went on to say that while he did not propose to hurry this thing through in haste, he should demand the early action of the Senate upon the resolution to seat Pinchback; that we had no right to keep the State unrepresented while we were inquiring into anything beyond the prima facie case. That Kellogg was governor he maintained by his argument. That being so, the credentials being in form, the whole question was settled, and we could do nothing until we seated Mr. Pinchback, and then he might be investigated as to fraud, bribery, or anything else. I then find that the Senator on a subsequent day made a motion to refer this matter back to the committee to investigate the matters he had before declared could not be investigated until after Pinchback was seated. It is not very important, and I did not propose to make any criticism upon the consistency of the Senator, except to show that he did not rely very much on the prima facie case himself. But when the Senator asserts that there is no inconsistency between his former speech and his subsequent motion, I must be permitted to say that I cannot see it in that light. When on one day he asserts that Kellogg is governor, and that being so the whole subject is ended, and Pinchback must be seated, and all improprieties attending his election must be subsequently investigated; and then on the next day he says, "In consequence of things that have come to my knowledge I wish to refer this matter back to the committee, so that they may investigate these improprieties before Pinchback is seated"—if there is no inconsistency in those two propositions, there is not between any two that ever were or ever can be stated.

So much for the prima facie case. The Senator's second point is that we cannot inquire into the existence of the State government, because Kellogg's government has been recognized by the President. I have said all that I care to about that. Third, because it has been recognized by the supreme court of Louisiana; and, fourth, because it has existed de facto for more than a year.

As to the last proposition, the length of time this government has been in existence, that certainly can add nothing to its title. We know how it has been in existence. It has not been in existence by the voluntary consent and assent of the people of Louisiana. We know the governor of that State cried for help in May last. We know that Federal troops are in New Orleans to-day. We know that that government has been sustained by the strong arm of Federal military power ever since Mr. Kellogg was inaugurated. Now that the righting of this wrong has been so long delayed, that a Legislature has been pretending to pass laws, and rights are supposed to have become vested under them, are inconveniences very great, I concede, which should induce Congress carefully to consider whether, under all the circumstances, it is best to do this thing or that, or to do nothing; but on the question I am discussing—the rightfulness of this government—I say whether it be upheld there by Federal force one year or five is immaterial. If it be a legal government, it was so the day it was set up. If it was not then, it is not now; and we understand how it has been held up from that time to this.

But let me say a few words in regard to these remarkable decisions of the State court of Louisiana. The Senator says we are bound by them. He refers to the settled doctrine that in the Federal judicial courts a line of decisions of a State court settling a principle of local law is always followed when the Federal courts pass upon the same question. He must be equally well aware that that rule is subject to a good many important exceptions, and one of these is, that if the decisions of the State court are not harmonious, the Federal courts will follow that decision which it considers most consonant with sound principle. This has been over and over again determined by the Supreme Court.

Let me say, however, before coming to this, that the ground upon which the judicial courts of the Union follow the decision of the State courts is that an act of Congress has prescribed the State laws as a rule for decisions in the Federal courts in cases where they apply; and in ascertaining what the State law is, the decisions of the State court, if they are uniform and have been continued through a series of years and been respected by the bench and bar of the State, are taken to be the highest evidence of what the local law is; but not so if they are inconsistent. The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Ohio Life and Trust Company vs. Debolt, 16 Howard, 432, and again in Gelpecke vs. Dubuque, 1 Wallace, 175, and in Havemeyer vs. Iowa County, 3 Wallace, 294, and in many other cases that might be cited, have established this exception to the rule, that if the decisions of the State court are not consistent, the Federal court wil follow those which they regard correct in principle.

I undertake to say that any man who will take the decisions rendered by the supreme court of Louisiana, commencing in May, 1872—the two decisions which I read here yesterday—and the decisions which they have made since this contest arose, will find it impossible to entertain the slightest respect for anything that court can declare. In the case which I read from yesterday they held in words that the attempted removal of Bovee by Governor Warmoth was an absolute nullity; that he never ceased to be secretary of state for one moment; that Herron, the man he appointed as his successor, never was secretary of state at all. And yet, when they came subsequently to decide between the two canvassing boards—the Lynch board and the Warmoth board—because it was necessary to sustain the Lynch board, they decided exactly the reverse. I will try to find that decision, as it so well illustrates what I mean. Bear in mind that this court, six months before this election was held, and when there was no contest, no temptation to do anything wrong, had held that Warmoth's attempt to remove Bovee was an absolute nullity; that his attempt to appoint Herron was absolutely void; that Herron never was secretary of state, and could perform none of the duties of secretary of state except the routine business of the office, and as to whether he could do even that they declined to express an opinion. On the 14th of November, after this election, and when it was necessary, in order to sustain Kellogg's government, to sustain the validity of the Lynch board, and in a case which was supposed to involve that question, the court used this language:

> We think there can be no doubt that the effort to make Wharton a member of the board was a total failure. Herron is described by Warmoth himself as secretary of state, and a member of the board, by virtue of such office, up to the appearing of Wharton, during the proceedings, on the second day of the meeting. The order suspending Bovee as secretary of state and appointing Herron, by the governor, on the 29th August, 1871, (which was before us in the case of the State ex rel. Bovee vs. Herron,) is in this record as a part of Wharton's testimony. This document, the above-named suit, and the published statutes of the State since August, 1871, show that Herron was de facto secretary of state, and according to the opinion in the suit just named and the constitution and laws of the State the governor was wholly without legal authority to suspend, remove, or appoint said officer.

Now see the attitude in which the court in placed. In May they decided that Bovee was not removed and Herron never was secretary of state. In December, when it was necessary to sustain the other side of the question, they decided that Herron was secretary of state, and that the governor, who had removed Bovee as secretary of state and appointed Herron, had no power to remove Herron and appoint Wharton; that is, he had less power over his own appointee than he had over the secretary of state elected by the people.

The court say, speaking of Warmoth's attempt to appoint Wharton in place of Herron:

> His attempted appointment of Wharton was an absolute nullity, and gave Wharton no color of authority to act, either as secretary of state, or member of the board of returning officers. Owing to the manner in which the case of the State ex rel. Bovee vs. Herron, decided, finally, about the time of the events above narrated, was managed, there was a final judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, decreeing the suspension of Bovee, as secretary of state, and appointment of Herron to discharge the duties thereof to be legal; and the effect of that judgment continued until the decision by this court (about the 2d of December, 1872) just referred to. Hence, as to the world Herron was the acting secretary of state at the above date, and it was not in the power of the governor to remove him, the governor having no control of said office.

To understand the absurdity of this decision, I should remind the Senate that after the governor did put Bovee out and put Herron in, Bovee commenced a suit against Herron, charging that he had intruded into the office. They fixed that up, Governor Warmoth, if I recollect aright, appointing a judge to try the case; and that judge decided in the court below that it was legal for the governor to remove the secretary of state and appoint Herron.

Bovee failed to take his appeal within the time fixed by law, and when the case reached the supreme court the appeal was dismissed for this irregularity. So the judgment of the court below remained in force as between the parties. Now, whom did this judgment bind? Every lawyer knows that if it bound anybody it bound Bovee and Herron only, and them only because they were parties to the record. An erroneous judgment rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction binds the parties to the record and their privies, but it binds nobody else. Now see the beauty of this remark of the court, that, in consequence of that erroneous decision, "as to the world Herron was secretary of state." They have just reversed the fact. As to all the world he was not secretary of state. As to Bovee, touching the question of salary for instance, Herron was secretary of state. Why? Because that judgment, although erroneous, bound Bovee, he being a party to the record; but it bound nobody else. But they say that that erroneous judgment as to all the world made Herron the secretary of state, who, as they had decided six months before, never was secretary of state at all; and they held that Herron, who had been put in by this hocus-pocus, was in so fast that even Warmoth could not get him out, and the only ground upon which Warmoth could get him in was that he had removed the man the people had elected; and yet he could not remove his own appointee.

If anybody wishes further to pursue the decisions of this court let him turn and read—for I lack the patience to do it—the case of Bovee vs. Herron, 24 Annual, 595; and if any lawyer will take those cases, read the decisions made when the judicial mind was unclouded by temptation, when no contest was pending, no necessity existing for any erroneous decision, holding expressly that Herron never was secretary of state, and could do no act as secretary of state, and then turn to the decisions made six months later by the same court, and can entertain the slightest respect for that court, either its intelligence or its integrity, I yield the palm to him; I cannot.

But, Mr. President, there is another very rich thing in this connection. The Senator from Indiana says that we are estopped; we, the Senate, pursuing an investigation which the Constitution lays upon us, are estopped to inquire into the facts because the courts of Louisiana have settled them. Now the same supreme court of Louisiana in two cases have held, (and they were driven to hold that to avoid overturning Kellogg's government altogether,) that they had no authority in any case to go back of the decision of the returning board. I hold in my hand a pamphlet, which was laid before our committee by Mr. Marr, and which contains, or is said to contain, opinions of the supreme court in cases decided since the reports have been published. This pamphlet was, however, conceded to be a truthful statement of these decisions. I read it believing it to be so. In the case of Collins vs. Knoblock, the court held this language:

> In cases under the intrusion law, courts cannot go behind the commissions legally issued, and to determine the validity of a commission, they cannot go beyond the returns and report of the legal returning officer for all elections of the State.
> The returns made by the legal State board, and officially promulgated by that board, as the general returning officers for the State at large, constitute the basis upon which the governor is authorized to issue commissions.
> This prima facie evidence, it is provided, may be rebutted and set aside, but this we apprehend could only be done by proceedings under the statute of 1855.

That is a proceeding before a political tribunal—a contestation as they call it—not in a judicial court. Again:

> It is well settled that the judiciary have no warrant or authority to exercise jurisdiction in matters of elections, unless it be expressly delegated by the co-ordinate branch of the Government controlling the political department, and no express authority is granted under the intrusion act to inquire into the correctness of election returns officially promulgated by the legal returning officers.
> The court a quâ erred in going into the inquiry in regard to the details of the election, and the correctness of the official returns promulgated by the returning officers.

This matter ought not to be lightly passed by. I wish some one was treating this subject now who could do justice to this point. I am not equal to it. But consider this proposition. There was a contest growing out of this very election; the court below erroneously thought that an election rested upon the votes and not upon the certificate; they therefore opened the question as to who was elected, and the Kellogg man was beaten because his opponent was proved to have received more votes. The case was appealed to the supreme court, and the supreme court held that no judicial tribunal in that State had authority to inquire into the fact of an election, but that the canvass by the board and the commission of the governor were conclusive. So they reversed the judgment, and conferred the office upon the candidate proved to have received the fewest votes.

Now, the Senator from Indiana maintains that when the Senate, pursuing the line of its constitutional duty, reaches the question whether Kellogg and his associates are the legal State officers and his Legislature has been duly elected, we are estopped, because the supreme court of Louisiana has settled that they are; although that court themselves declare they have no jurisdiction to determine that question. The determination of a court having no jurisdiction to inquire is made conclusive upon an inquiry as to which the Constitution makes us the exclusive judges. This is one of the healthy legal propositions which the Senator from Indiana is driven to maintain.

Mr. MORTON. Does the Senator think now that he states the case fully?

Mr. CARPENTER. I know I state it as fully as is necessary to the decision of this question.

Mr. MORTON. The supreme court of Louisiana in that case decided that they could not go into the question as to who was elected, because there was another tribunal created by the law to determine that question—a special tribunal created by the laws of Louisiana for that purpose, and they are bound by the decision of that tribunal. That tribunal is the returning board. But they do decide who constitute the returning board, and when they have decided that they say that they cannot go behind the decision of that returning board, because the jurisdiction is conferred upon that board to make the returns. That is all of it.

Mr. CARPENTER. And that is a good deal more than there is of it, too. Then the revised position of the Senator is this: We set out here to inquire as to the existence of certain officers; we are estopped in that inquiry because the supreme court of the State have settled it; and now he says that the supreme court have said they had no jurisdiction to inquire into it because some other tribunal had. Well, I do not care what is the reason that the supreme court cannot inquire into it; all that it is necessary for me to make out in order to show that their decision cannot bind us is that the court making the decision had no jurisdiction to inquire into the facts. If the Senator chooses to rest that want of power to inquire upon one ground instead of another, it is all the same to me; but still I maintain that we cannot be bound by the decisions of a court which had no jurisdiction to inquire into the question which we must decide.

Mr. MORTON. They had jurisdiction to decide which was the board, and did decide it.

Mr. CARPENTER. They had jurisdiction to repeat, parrot-like, as the Senator has done after them; and so all these questions, from the right of a Senator of the United States down to the right of every parish officer in Louisiana, are to be settled by a false return, proved false in every court that has ever investigated it; known to be false by every man who has ever examined it; proved false by the very men who made it, and known by the Senator himself to be an unparalleled fraud; and that false canvass has estopped the State courts, and the State courts estop us, and everything is concluded by a fraud which is confessed on all hands and laid bare by an investigation of a committee of this body.

There are two cases in the pamphlet to which I have alluded in which the supreme court of Louisiana hold expressly that they are bound by the commission and cannot go behind it.

And now, because, as I have said before, it is my purpose never to open my mouth about this case again, I desire here to say a few words in regard to the bill which I now give notice I shall offer to-morrow morning, for a new election in the State of Louisiana. I have tried to show from the record, from the testimony taken by the committee under the safeguard of an oath and laid on your table, that Mr. Kellogg never was elected governor, that his associates in the State offices never were elected, that the men he calls his Legislature never were elected, and that none of them have any decent pretext to claim that they are in office in consequence of the expressed will of the people of Louisiana. I shall not again go over these grounds, but I claim to have established these propositions.

We had before us in the committee the original returns which were laid before the De Feriet board by Governor Warmoth. Of those returns there are two or three bushels, I suppose, and we had them in our committee. We sent a subpœna to Louisiana and they were brought here. Mr. Ray was before the committee, and Mr. McMillen was before the committee, and Mr. Pinchback was before the committee conducting their respective sides of the case, and they all agreed that those were the returns, and agreed that those returns showed the result which had been arrived at by the De Feriet board; that McEnery had 9,606 majority. There was no contest about it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Were those the original returns?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Coming from the parishes?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And sent up to be counted by the State board?

Mr. CARPENTER. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. Original returns many of which proved to be outright forgeries.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Like the affidavits on the other side?

Mr. MORTON. Forgeries in every particular.

Mr. CARPENTER. I get considerably confused here as to who is making this speech, the Senator from Indiana or myself, [laughter,] but I will go on for awhile longer.

Mr. MORTON. I thought the Senator had been confused all through.

Mr. CARPENTER. If I am not, it is certainly not the fault of the Senator from Indiana. He has done what he could to confuse me. [Laughter.]

The canvass made by the De Feriet board and based upon the returns gives McEnery 9,606 majority. The report of the canvass by the Lynch board gives Kellogg 18,000 majority. Now, let me repeat, these returns, the original papers, which if there had been no contest whatever in Louisiana as to who constituted the returning board, would have been laid before that board and would have been canvassed by the board, were brought bodily into the committee-room in the basement of this Capitol for our examination. It is not pretended that with any single return there came a statement which under the State law would authorize the returning board to inquire into the legality and fairness of the election.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I do not interrupt the Senator I wish to ask a question. The Senator from Indiana states that many of these returns coming from the parishes, so called, were totally forgeries, and that that appeared before the committee. I should like to know how far that extends.

Mr. CARPENTER. That is one of those statements that that Senator from Indiana can make and nobody can help it.

Mr. MORTON. Does the Senator deny the showing?

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not deny anything the Senator from Indiana says, but I simply say this: I never heard of it before; I mean in the form of evidence. I heard his suspicions.

Mr. MORTON. There is evidence showing that in a number of instances the signatures were forgeries, all in the same handwriting.

Mr. CARPENTER. As you have rendered me so much assistance about this speech, will you not turn me to the testimony which shows that?

Mr. MORTON. I have not got the testimony here now.

Mr. CARPENTER, [handing Mr. MORTON the report and testimony.] Can you find it in the course of a half hour? If so, I will wait.

Mr. MORTON. Perhaps I can.

Mr. CARPENTER. If I have reached a point where the Senator from Indiana will not render me any further assistance, I am in a pretty bad way. [Laughter.]

I will state to the Senator from Vermont what I believe the fact to be. The machinery of holding the election is this: one officer acts for the whole parish, and then they have what are called commissioners at each poll in the parish. When the ballots are put in the box, the boxes are taken to the parish seat, from all the polls, counted by the supervisor or registrar, whatever his title is, and then the returns are made out for all the polls, and they are signed by the commissioners of each poll, and then all of them are signed by the supervisor; that is, the parish officer. My recollection of the matter is, that in several of the cases, taking the polls from any one parish, they seemed all to be in the same handwriting, so far as the signatures of the commissioners of the polls are concerned. The explanation of that, as I understand, is that the commissioners were very frequently men who could not write, and the same man wrote the returns, their signatures and all; but each one had the genuine signature of the parish officer. I understand that to be the fact. If there was any forgery of anything beyond that I do not know of it. I know that these returns were before us; the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] looked over the returns and found two or three that he thought were all in the same handwriting. I understand that to be the explanation of it; that they were all from the same parish, for instance, and all in the same handwriting, except the signature of the parish officer.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I will state my recollection of it, because I agree with the Senator that there was fraud on both sides; so much so that no honest man could say that there was a fair election. But there were seven sets of returns that were counted by the Warmoth board that I examined myself and asked a witness in reference to, and those returns were all in the same handwriting—figures, certificates, and everything else. I held them up and asked some of the witnesses, I do not remember who, if they were not forgeries; and the general understanding was, and the reply was to the committee at that time, that those seven returns were forgeries from head to foot.

Mr. MORTON. And the Senator from Wisconsin himself agreed to it at the time.

Mr. CARPENTER. I think the Senator from Indiana is mistaken.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no doubt myself that those returns were made up at the office. It does not make the case any better on either side, but that is my recollection of it.

Mr. CARPENTER. In that respect I am undoubtedly mistaken; the Senator from Illinois no doubt recollects the facts, and the Senator from Indiana is undoubtedly right in that particular; but I have no recollection of any witness having been interrogated on that subject, and I never heard anything about those returns, as I now remember, until after the testimony was closed, and we were discussing the subject. Then I recollect the Senator from Illinois made a statement as to some which he had examined and thought were forgeries. My present belief is that any examination upon this subject was when I was not with the committee. But take those cases; take them to-day; send for those returns, and say that they are forgeries, and throw them out in all the cases mentioned, and I think the result would still be the same; in other words, in those cases which the Senator from Illinois thinks were forgeries the whole vote in favor of McEnery would not change the result. Is not that so?

Mr. LOGAN. I will not state positively about that, because I do not remember what the evidence did show. My impression, however, is that it would be different. But that was not the reason I suggested it. I only suggested it from the fact that we came to the conclusion that the fraud was so evident on both sides that we could not agree to anything except the report which we made. I only speak of these seven returns that I examined myself to show the character of them; and these seven returns, my recollection is, were from strong democratic parishes; but I may be mistaken about that. All I examined were of the very same character, whether from republican parishes or democratic parishes. My recollection is that the majority of them were democratic, but I am not sure about that.

Mr. CARPENTER. Be that as it may, the returns were there; genuine or forged, the returns were before our committee, the returns that ought to have been sent to the canvassing board. If they had been forgeries, and could have been proved to be so, the canvassing board ought to have rejected them. But the board which did canvass Mr. Kellogg in never had any returns, never had either the genuine or forged returns, never had anything upon which it had any legal authority to act at all.*

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me a moment right here?

Mr. CARPENTER. To which point of my speech do you want to reply here?

Mr. MORTON. Right in this connection.

Mr. CARPENTER. I yield.

Mr. MORTON. Supposing that this discussion is intended for the development of truth, and not for mere trifling, I desire to call the attention of my friend to this fact, that in his report he stated that it was testified before the committee that the control that Warmoth had over the machinery of the election was counted equal to 20,000 votes, and that the testimony before the committee bore out the truth of that statement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Counted by whom as equal to 20,000 votes?

Mr. MORTON. That when the coalition was formed between Warmoth and the democrats his control over the machinery of the election was counted as equal to 20,000 votes; and the Senator in his report stated that the evidence afterward showed that it was.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do you mean that the Kellogg canvassers made that allowance accordingly?

Mr. MORTON. No, sir; I am only stating what the Senator from Wisconsin said in his report.

Mr. CARPENTER. I desire to thank my friend from Indiana. He has returned to help me, and put in a part of my speech which I should have put in myself in three minutes if he had let me alone, and which I am just coming to. I say that these returns are somewhere in existence, genuine or forged. They could have been produced if there had been anybody to canvass them; but they never have been canvassed by anybody who has had any pretense of authority except the De Feriet board, which was appointed by the governor under the act approved November 20, 1872, and whose canvass may be found on page 81 of the report.

My understanding is that, taking all those parishes where it was suspected that the returns were false—I mean the papers themselves; I am not speaking now about an honest, truthful return, but one which has been absolutely forged—throwing out all those returns, McEnery would still be elected by several thousand majority; and my recollection is that that was talked over, and that is where I think the Senator has got his impression that the democrats did not claim over six thousand majority. That is, throwing out all the parishes that were questioned on the ground of forgery would not change the result. I do not care anything about that, because the Senator knows very well, and the Senate knows very well, that I am not trying to make out here that McEnery was elected; I do not believe he was; and I am not trying to make out that those returns ought to preclude us from ascertaining the facts. I have always contended that they did not.

But what was the real fraud committed in that election? This brings me to the part of my speech that the Senator from Indiana has just made for me. Governor Warmoth was in possession of the State; and I mean all that these words imply. He owned the Legislature; he had laws passed in blank which he could approve at pleasure; he carried the courts in his pocket. He was the State. His control over the election, his power to appoint the officers who conducted the election, were proved before our committee to be worth 20,000 votes in any election in that State. It was said that when they fixed up the fusion between the democrats and liberal republicans, they counted Warmoth's accession worth 20,000 votes, because he had the machinery of the election in his hands and could manipulate it at pleasure.

Another most remarkable provision of the law of that State is that the supervisor of registration appointed by the governor may determine how many polling places there shall be in each parish, and where they shall be located, and these may be varied as to number and location at each election; so that if the governor wanted to carry that State for the republicans, he would fix in the republican parishes a great number of voting places, making it very convenient for voters; and in the democratic parishes he would fix only two or three, and make men travel twenty or thirty miles to get to the polls. If he wanted to carry it fusion or democratic, he would reverse that process and stud the democratic parishes all over with voting places, and establish but few in the republican parishes, and those at inconvenient points.

It so happened that this fall Governor Warmoth was acting with the McEnery party. He organized that election. There is no doubt about it in my mind, not the slightest. In parishes where there ought to be a large republican vote he so arranged the voting places that in some instances men had to travel twenty or thirty miles to vote. He studied artfully to put the voting places at the most inconvenient points and as far as possible from traveled routes; and the testimony, I think, shows that in some instances the people were not informed how many voting places there were, nor where they were situated, until the very day of the election. The consequence was that in the strong republican counties the vote was light, and in the democratic counties the vote was heavy; and in that way, and by the obstacles placed in the way of registration of republicans, they secured the result shown by the returns, and, as I believe, completely reversing the will of the people.

Now, Senators may ask me, and my colleague has in conversation two or three times asked me, to point out particularly the testimony that shows this. Well, it is one of those facts which appear, I think satisfactorily, from the whole case. It is not a fact which could in the nature of things be testified to positively by any one witness. The testimony does show, however, that all the men that had charge of the election were Warmoth and McEnery men. It shows that the polls were so established in the republican parishes that they were next to inaccessible; and it shows, too, that every obstacle possible was thrown in the way of the registration of republicans. In the nature of things, the extent of effect produced by any one of these causes can only be estimated; it cannot be the subject of direct proof; and this is just the case which can be investigated only by legislative, not by judicial methods. My belief is, that if any judicial court to-day had jurisdiction of the question in Louisiana, the result of that election, as held, that is to say the result of the ballots actually cast, would be shown to be that McEnery was elected; but I am equally well persuaded that the result misrepresents the will and the intention of the people of that State on that election day, and that it was in consequence of these frauds and obstacles in the way of registration, and the fraudulent location of voting places, that Warmoth was able to carry that State by from six to nine thousand majority in favor of McEnery. I believe that if my colleague will take that testimony, and wade through it, and devote as many hours as I have days to the examination of it, he will be thoroughly convinced, as I am, that such is the case, although he may not be able to point to any particular sentence in proof of it.

It was in the testimony before us that in the parishes of Natchitoches, Bossier, and others, the polls were so located that men had to travel from twenty to thirty miles. Now take any of our Northwestern States, take Wisconsin, and suppose the people had to travel twenty-five or thirty miles to vote, and there was nothing of especial importance depending on the result, how many of our people would travel thirty miles to vote? We all know that it is with the greatest difficulty (and that makes it necessary to resort to all campaign contrivances, speeches, public meetings, and barbecues) we can get the people out when they have to travel four or five miles to vote. Suppose they had to travel twenty or thirty miles, and then suppose such a population as exists in Louisiana in the republican parishes, where they were to a great extent poor colored men who had no means of conveyance, who had to walk thirty miles to vote and walk back the next day, and suffer the expense and fatigue of such a journey—how many under such circumstances would be likely to vote? So I believe, from this testimony and from the whole history of the case, that although of the ballots actually cast McEnery had a majority, yet in consequence of the frauds committed previous to the election, that result utterly reverses what was the wish and intention of that people.

And there is no doubt, I think, of one other thing—that but for the interference by the General Government McEnery's government would have been in existence to-day. It was smothered, in the first place, by Durell, who issued an injunction to the officers of the State Legislature, restraining them from calling the McEnery men, and a mandamus compelling them to call the members canvassed in by the Lynch board. Under these circumstances the Legislature which elected Mr. Pinchback was organized. While the matter was pending here before us on the 26th of February, 1873, as I find by the newspapers

*Since this discussion I have examined the report of the committee, and all I can find in relation to forged returns is on the last page of the report, as follows:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., Thursday, February 13, 1873.

"JOHN RAY recalled.

"The WITNESS. I desire to call the attention of the committee to a statement, at a suggestion made by one member of the committee yesterday. I examined and found, and if the committee will act as experts they will find, that the commissioners of elections in several cases in the parishes have their names forged to the affidavits. For instance, there is one from Madison Parish, [exhibiting the papers,] and so in the parish of Grant also, and in the parish of Point Coupee, and the parish of East Baton Rouge, which, if the committee will examine as experts, they will find it very evident in some cases that they were forged."

In the parishes mentioned the returns show the following result:

Parish.	McEnery.	Kellogg.
	Votes.	Votes.
Madison	837	1,227
Grant	514	405
Point Coupee	1,142	1,552
East Baton Rouge	1,644	1,166
Total	4,137	4,350

So that if the returns from all these parishes had been excluded as forgeries, Kellogg's vote would have been reduced 213. It will hardly be believed that the democrats were forging returns to increase Kellogg's majority. If McEnery's vote were excluded in these parishes, and Kellogg's counted, McEnery would, as shown by the returns, still have 4,469 majority.

of that date, the following telegram was sent from Washington by Mr. Packard, our United States marshal, to his deputy in New Orleans:

WASHINGTON, February 26, 1873.

T. W. DEKLYNE, Deputy United States Marshal:

Tell Kellogg to keep his shirt on. His talk of a compromise only irritates authorities. The only compromise is for members elected to go in and take their seats in the Legislature, and that excludes all contest. The McEnery government must be broken up as soon as Congress adjourns.

S. B. PACKARD.

Congress adjourned on the 4th of March. It had been telegraphed from Washington that the McEnery government must be broken up as soon as Congress should adjourn. Kellogg sent his metropolitan police—a military brigade, armed with Winchester rifles and led by Brigadier-General Badger—backed by United States troops within call, and the McEnery Legislature was dispersed by force. Members of the senate and members of the house were arrested. McEnery escaped through a back window. That was what was done by Kellogg in obedience to this command from Packard to break up the McEnery government as soon as Congress adjourned; and McEnery and his Legislature are now petitioning Congress to order a new election.

In this attitude of the case I wish for a very few moments (and that will conclude what I have to say) to discuss the power of Congress to order a new election. Instead of devoting the mere closing moments of an argument to this subject, it ought to be the subject of a day's argument. But I can, in a very few words, indicate the processes by which my mind reaches the conclusion that we possess the power to order this new election.

The Constitution declares that we shall guarantee to every State a republican form of government. I read that phrase to mean that the United States shall guarantee to every State a republican government. It could not have been intended that a government which in its mere form or constitutional structure was republican would satisfy that provision. The men who framed the Constitution were men who dealt with substance and fact, not with names and forms. They meant to secure ends; and when they declare that the States shall at all times have, and that the United States shall take care that every State has, a republican government, it means something more than a mere form; it means that the practical governing power of the State shall be republican—that is, shall be elected by the people. No government can claim to be republican that is not elected by the people; and therefore if to-day the powers of that State government are exercised by men who have no right resting on an election, then I say that government is not a republican government. I do not speak of the mere constitution, (which, I suppose, reposes in some pigeon-hole in the state-house.) I speak of the government that exists, the power that is seen and felt, that makes laws, that tries criminals, that commands militia, that exercises sovereign powers. I say that governing power in Louisiana to-day never was elected by the people of Louisiana. Therefore I say Louisiana to-day has not a republican government. It is fact, substance, which that provision of the Constitution intended to secure.

Now, what is our power, assuming, as I do, that these men were not elected? It is our duty to guarantee to every State a republican government. That is a full, complete, entire guarantee covering the whole subject. Suppose, Mr. President, you had made a lease to some man and his heirs for ninety-nine years, and had covenanted that you would keep the farm-house on the premises in good repair; that you and your heirs would do so for ninety-nine years, what would be your duty? If the house were consumed from cellar to garret, you would be compelled to rebuild the house. If it was partially destroyed by a fire, your duty would be performed by reconstructing the demolished portion of it, so that the entire structure would be as good as the house was when the place was rented. So here in 1865 you found the State government entirely demolished, destroyed to the foundation, and you commenced at the foundation to reconstruct the government. You called a constitutional convention, you authorized the forming of a constitution, you provided for elections under that constitution, you set up the entire government from its foundation to its dome. Now, then, we find, not the whole State overturned, but a part of it languishing; we find the political department of the government on its back, and no power in that State to set it up, no power in the Legislature to order a re-election, no power in the constitution of that State to have a new election until four years, for State officers. What is your duty? You are to deal with the demolished portion of that government as you would deal with the whole government if it were entirely overturned. It is not necessary here to change the constitution, nor interfere with the supreme court; it is not necessary, in other words, to meddle with that part of the structure that remains entire; but the part that is ruined, the part that has lapsed, the political department of the government, you must set on its feet, or it cannot exist for four years. I say that it is your duty to order a new election. Your powers are commensurate with your duty. The Constitution does not say how you shall do the thing; it says you shall do it; and you are to employ the necessary means. In this case, fortunately, you can perform your entire duty, and give them a republican government by simply holding an election and declaring that these men when elected shall go into the offices and take up the threads of official life where they would have been to-day had they been elected last November. You thus supply the defect in that government, you repair what is wanting, and you give and secure and guarantee to that State a republican government by putting on its feet what is now on its back.

In the case of Georgia—not entirely like this, because Georgia was to some extent in the process of reconstruction, her Senators had not been admitted, I think, but her members had been admitted into the House of Representatives—what was done? The Legislature assembled there and by intimidation expelled all the colored men so as completely to change the political character of that Legislature. What did we do? We said that was not a republican Legislature—I do not mean republican in a party sense, but it was not such a Legislature as the people had elected. What did we do? We passed a law requiring the officers of that Legislature to call together again the men who had been elected, white and colored, and put them back and organize the Legislature as it was organized originally. No doubt we had the power to do that. No doubt we have the power to do this, because when the Constitution, uttering the sovereign command of the people, says the United States shall do a thing, and does not say how it shall do it, it may employ any necessary means.

This is one of those unlimited powers conferred upon us in gross. It could not be limited; it could not be defined; because the framers of the Constitution could not foresee all the contingencies and all the emergencies that might arise in these States. They granted a general power. They say to us, "See to it that at all times every State has a republican government, a government elected by the people of the State; and no matter what it may be necessary to do to accomplish that end, whether it is to order an election or to reconstruct a Legislature; whether it is to overturn the whole concern and rebuild from the base, do whatever is necessary in any particular case; because in the name of the people we command you to do the particular thing, and leave you all means and the choice of every possible means," not expressly prohibited of course by other provisions of the Constitution.

Now, Mr. President, speaking about the government of Louisiana, and whether it is republican or not, I hold in my hand a copy of the New Orleans Republican, the Kellogg paper, of January 6, 1874, glorifying Durell, from its political stand-point not undeservedly:

Generals SHELDON, SYPHER, Representatives DARRALL, MOREY, and SMITH, Lieutenant-Governor Antoine, Auditor Clinton, Superintendent Brown, Secretary of State Deslonde, Senator Pinchback, Speaker Lowell, Judge Hawkins, all the republican members of both houses who were elected in 1872, in short all the republican officers, appointees, and employés to-day owe their places to the firm, inflexible, learned, just man who now seems to be turned over to receive the buffets of the combined hosts of democracy. The democratic papers were right in ascribing to Judge Durell all the credit of having thrown himself timely in the breach and stayed the tide of disaster which treachery and cunning had wrought for the defeat of republicans.

That does not overstate Durell's services. That government undoubtedly owes its existence, from Kellogg down to every member of the Legislature, to the fiat of a Federal judge; and we are told if we order a new election State rights will be violated. Why, Mr. President, if we had left that muddle alone, if we had washed our hands of it from the first and stood aloof, then there might be some plausibility in saying "Let them fight it out among themselves." But the Government of the United States intervened in the affairs of that State, and through its judicial department set up a bogus government. Now, says the Senator from Indiana, to right this wrong would be to violate State rights, and on that rallying-cry, a cry that the democratic party in this Chamber and elsewhere never refuse to follow, the Senator from Indiana, placing himself at the head of the democratic party, led them in the contest on this bill last year, and defeated the bill for a new election by two majority. State rights! A State absolutely defrauded of rightful government by Federal interference, and when Congress proposes to redress the wrong and relieve the State from this imposition and outrage, "O," says the Senator from Indiana, (and he must have smiled in his sleeve when he said it,) "it would violate State rights to undo the wrong that you have done in that State." [Laughter.] So that if the people of Louisiana have not to-day a government elected by themselves; if they have not a republican government; if they have not what the Constitution guarantees to them that they shall have, and makes it our duty to see that they have, they have what is far dearer to every democrat than any practical good—they have State rights!

Mr. President, I propose to vindicate State rights by our action here. I say the State of Louisiana has been trodden beneath the foot of a Federal judge. I say that we may not and cannot stand here blameless and see that wrong continued. Is there a man in this Chamber to-day, is there a lawyer who hears my voice, who does not believe that these orders issued by Durell were without the shadow of jurisdiction? Is there a man, be he lawyer or layman, who does not know that the original order of Durell, void when issued, was what set up the Kellogg government, and that it has been from that time to this supported by military power; and can any man doubt that to redress a wrong of that kind would be an act friendly to the rights of that State?

Mr. President, to show how this Louisiana matter is looked upon by those who are totally disconnected with the contest, I want to read a note of Judge Cooley, of Michigan, in his edition of Story's works. While we were sitting here discussing this subject at the last session, he was preparing an edition of Story on the Constitution; and I will read the note which he has appended touching this Louisiana matter. Mark, this is not the language of a partisan, but of a judge learned and revered, separated from this contest geographically, and from all partisan feeling by his official station. In the calm seclusion of his closet, where the poet says the scales which weigh the actions of others are held with unfeverish hand, this judge has appended to this constitutional work a note in regard to the subject which I am now discussing, under the clause of the Constitution guaranteeing a republican form of government to every State:

The recent case of Louisiana demonstrates that there may be greater wrongs than even the wrongful refusal by Congress to recognize the legitimate government of a State, and yet no speedy and effectual remedy be attainable. Such action on the part of Congress would at least be that of a proper authority, and would imply deliberation, and be supported by a presumption of due regard for the public good and for the supremacy of the law. But in the case of Louisiana in 1873, an inferior Federal judge, without a shadow of authority, and consequently in defiance of law, and for that reason supported by no presumption of correct motives, and with scarcely a pretense of observing even the usual forms, by the process of his court, aided by a military force, installed in power a State government which he sided with as against rival claimants, and in consequence of a pressure of business in Congress precluding prompt attention to the case by that body, has been enabled to sustain this government in power until the present time. Mr. Justice Story has with reason predicted that "if a despotic or monarchical government were established in one State it would bring on the ruin of the whole republic." What government can be more despotic—

And I call attention to this language particularly, for it bears on the precise point now under discussion—

what government can be more despotic than one elected by an injunction, and continued in power by a military force under the order of a judge who, having no jurisdiction, is restrained by no law but his own arbitrary will? For the facts of this unparalleled wrong we refer to reports made by the Judiciary Committee of the United States Senate, in February, 1873. The case requires no further comment than it there receives. The dullest mind cannot fail to see that the facility with which the wrong is committed, and the possible immediate advantages which individuals may derive therefrom, present constant temptations to its repetition, and if suffered to pass once unrebuked, a precedent will be tacitly asserted which cannot fail to threaten constant danger to our liberties, especially at those very periods of high political excitement when prudence, caution, and the strictest regard for the Constitution and the laws are most important. What party, or what political leader, can, at such times, be expected to pay scrupulous deference to the laws if a judge may ignore them with impunity? It was thought the climax of wrong had been reached when a local judge in one of the States could seize upon the property of individuals and corporations through his injunctions and mandates, and plunder them through receivers; but he at least was not acting wholly without jurisdiction, and if he seized property, he did not venture to go so far as to make the liberties of the people the subject of a receivership.

Mr. President, if I owe an apology to the Senate for the warmth of any expressions I have used to-day, I refer, in mitigation, to this language of a judge whose blood was not stirred by the excitement of debate, and who has denounced the conduct of Judge Durell more severely than I have or can, because criticism is always more severe when free from passion and couched in the temperate language which characterizes the bench.

Mr. President, I have done with this matter. I devoted to this investigation several weeks in the committee last winter. I came here and sat all night long until five o'clock in the morning, endeavoring and hoping to pass the bill for a new election. I have performed my duty. I will prepare and introduce to-morrow a bill ordering a new election in the State of Louisiana.

I thank you, Mr. President, and I thank the Senate, for the patience and the attention with which you have heard me through remarks protracted much longer than they would have been by the fact that I am suffering under great physical depression.

Mr. MORTON addressed the Senate; and having spoken some time said:

Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate any longer to-night, but I have not finished.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do I understand that my friend from Indiana wishes to go on on Monday?

Mr. MORTON. I have not concluded, I will say to my friend.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to move to take up the bankrupt bill, if there is no objection. Does the Senator wish to go on on Monday?

Mr. MORTON. I should like to continue a little while longer.

Mr. THURMAN. Let us understand this matter. Do I understand that the Senator from Indiana has concluded his remarks?

Mr. MORTON. No, sir; I have not.

[Mr. MORTON'S speech in full will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. In that case I move, or shall in a moment move, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business; but I give notice that as soon as my friend shall have concluded, or as soon thereafter as it shall be the pleasure of the Senate, I shall ask to take up the bankrupt bill. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fourteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and twenty-four minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 30, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

HOURS AND WAGES OF LABOR.

Mr. MONROE. The Committee on Education and Labor instruct me to report back one or two matters, without any discussion or comment. The first is the petition of M. Spahn and others, representing the Bricklayers' Association of the District of Columbia, praying for relief in regard to the number of hours of work and the wages of labor upon public works of the United States. The Committee on Education and Labor have considered this subject, and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of it, because they regard it as a matter for the executive rather than for the legislative branch of the Government. It is rather a question of administration under the law than a question for this place. I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and that the same be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

Mr. MONROE. The Committee on Education and Labor also ask permission to report back to the House certain petitions praying Congress to authorize a commission to inquire into the liquor traffic and its influence to produce pauperism and crime; and ask to be discharged from their further consideration, because petitions of this class and certain bills relating to the same subject have, by common consent, been sent to the Committee on the Judiciary, where I suppose the subject properly belongs. I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions, and that they be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

BREAKWATER AT CLEVELAND, OHIO.

Mr. PARSONS. I ask unanimous consent to present the memorial of the city council of Cleveland, Ohio, relative to the construction of a harbor of refuge at Cleveland, Ohio, and a resolution on the same subject of the Board of Trade of Cleveland. I desire a few minutes, not exceeding fifteen, to explain the matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PARSONS] asks that, by unanimous consent, he be allowed fifteen minutes to make some remarks on the subject of the memorial and resolution he has presented. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the special attention of the House to the resolutions I have had the honor to present for its consideration. These resolutions were passed by the Board of Trade and city council of Cleveland, and relate to the pressing necessity which exists for the building by the General Government of a harbor of refuge at some point adjacent to or near that city.

I am painfully aware, sir, that a grave duty is imposed upon us, as the Representatives of the people, at this time to watch with jealous care all demands made for the expenditure of the public moneys. And I am equally aware that it is the desire of this House to avoid as far as possible the voting for the construction of any new works of magnitude, which may call for a large expenditure of the public treasure. No man, I trust, sir, upon this floor appreciates the situation of the country more keenly than myself, or will endeavor to the extent of his ability to aid the House in all its legislation with an eye single to the strictest economy and prudence, in every branch of the public service. But, sir, a long and somewhat varied experience in public life has convinced me that there may be a too rigid economy that is not prudence, and an apparent saving that ends in loss, and oftentimes in positive disaster. It is with nations as with individuals—"There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty."

While for the moment there has come a time in the history of the country when its expenses are larger than its receipts, yet it does not follow, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] has stated, that the nation is bankrupt, or that its credit is in any manner impaired. Nor does it follow that, because of this temporary decrease of income, the public works are to be arrested, the public buildings permitted to fall into decay, the public docks, piers, and wharves, built at enormous expense, to perish for needed repairs, or that our harbors and rivers are to be neglected, and the funds necessary for keeping them in proper order are to be withheld, or the great channels of trade and commerce of this mighty nation to be in any manner obstructed for the want of needful and proper expenditures. The commerce of the country is its life; and whatever is absolutely necessary to aid, foster, encourage, and protect it must be done. To permit it in any manner to languish or become crippled will prove the most disastrous economy that was ever practiced by any people, and, in the end, would produce the very poverty, bankruptcy, and ruin that every wise man seeks to prevent.

During the last five years the administration of General Grant has paid over four hundred millions of the public debt, a far greater sum than the law required. If this enormous decrease of the public debt has been made too rapidly, or in any manner beyond the necessities of the public interests, we can, without detriment, stop this policy by withholding taxation, until the material interests of the country will warrant its resumption. It is entirely practicable, and in my judgment wholly consistent with the wisest economy, and without imposing any additional taxes upon the people, or inflation of the volume of the currency, to provide by a temporary loan, for a year or two, for any necessary deficit in the current expenditures of the Government. This to me would seem a far wiser statesmanship than to permit the real material interests of this country to suffer, by withholding the needful means for the development of the wealth of the country, by neglecting to provide for our rivers and harbors vital improvements and protection, by neglecting to sustain, foster, and encourage as far as possible the magnificent inland commerce of the country, its pride and source of national greatness. While the ships of our land vie with those of other nations in bringing to our shores, and carrying abroad to the farthest corners of the earth, the commerce of the world, the inland commerce of the country is by far the greatest in magnitude, and year by year growing with such wonderful rapidity, that it is at this moment the gravest question we are called upon to meet, as legislators, how best to promote, protect, and provide for its vast and increasing demands.

With all the vast extent of our country, interlaced all over with a net-work of railroads, with mighty seas called inland lakes, and rivers flowing in almost every direction, capable of carrying almost limitless quantities of agricultural, mineral, and manufacturing commodities from ocean to ocean, and from the Saint Lawrence River to the Gulf of Mexico, yet the cry everywhere is for greater, broader, ampler, and cheaper means of transport; and to this appeal Congress cannot long turn a deaf or indifferent ear. This country, though temporarily depressed, is the richest and most prosperous on which the sun shines. It has boundless resources, every variety of soil and climate, vast and fertile fields rich in agricultural wealth, inexhaustible mines of coal, iron, silver, copper, and gold; manufactories producing yearly thousands of millions of dollars in value, a commerce that whitens every sea and ocean and lake and river in the world; a prosperous and enlightened people, capable of proving to the world, which looks on in wonder, their capacity for self-government, and the wisdom of a nation formed and carried on "for the people and by the people." And yet it is this land of ours, in a time of profound peace, with no great standing army or navy, like England, or France, or Prussia, to absorb its wealth and curtail its industries, that at this moment is claimed to be unable to carry on its yearly expenditures for public improvements; that is asked to let its own vessels lie half finished upon the stocks; its harbors and rivers to be seriously impaired by neglect and want of proper care; its great piers and wharves and docks, built at an enormous expense, to go surely to decay, and all because in a time of temporary depression the expenses of the Government are for a moment beyond its actual income. To some minds this policy may seem economical, prudent, and statesman-like; to me it seems short-sighted and disastrous.

It is not true, in fact, that the money paid by the United States for permanent improvements like those of the public buildings, should be counted as a part of the ordinary expenditures for carrying on the Government of the country. These great buildings become a part and parcel of the substantial property of the Government. They are solid investments built for all time, and in most cases are at this moment worth their actual cost to the country, and in many cases far beyond it. In my own city the United States does not own a single piece of property that would not bring at public auction more than its original cost. Hence, if the Government was compelled to sell a small portion of its bonds for the completion of these buildings it would simply add to its nominal indebtedness, but at the same time secure the full value of the debt in substantial and durable landed property. For these reasons I am opposed to the stoppage of work upon the great public buildings of the country, and believe it the highest wisdom to complete them at the earliest practicable moment. Especially at this time, when labor can be procured at a moderate rate, and so many families are suffering for employment, I would advocate, as far as practicable, the continuance of work upon the public buildings as the wisest economy, and in accordance with the practice of other countries when private demands are insufficient to employ the substantial laboring men of the nation.

With these views, Mr. Speaker, I address myself to the immediate question before me.

It will be admitted by all, that the great chain of lakes, of which Lake Erie is one, forms at this time the most important means of communication for the vast agricultural, mineral, and commercial wealth which is annually transported between the eastern sea-board and the great Northwestern States. On these inland seas there annually float more than thirty-four hundred vessels, valued at nearly $25,000,000, and carrying a commerce vastly greater than the whole foreign commerce of the country. It is needless to add that if at any future time the demands of the people of the Northwest and South for cheap transportation should be heeded by Congress, and a water communication be opened from the Mississippi River to the Atlantic coast, this commerce would be immensely increased, and this noble chain of lakes would become the great national highway over which our products would be carried to supply the markets of the world.

I do not intend to detain the House with any extended remarks upon this branch of my subject, but would earnestly refer the House to an exhaustive report made last year to the House by Hon. Mr. CONGER, from the Committee on Commerce. That report is a masterly review of this whole subject of cheap transportation, its needs and claims upon the country, and cites the action of the several States, conventions, Legislatures, boards of trade, &c., which have taken action upon this subject.

In reading that report, with its array of statistics and important facts, gathered with painstaking labor, the almost boundless resources and wealth of these States, whose marketable produce must find its way (if ever) to the sea-board over the great chain of lakes, will be abundantly realized. And it is upon one of the most important of these lakes, and near to one of the most growing and thriving cities of the country, that the resolutions just presented ask for special and needed legislation.

I shall take the liberty of calling the attention of the House to a few important statistics connected with this subject. They tell their own story, and from them the House can gather the most important and valuable information. They have been repeatedly presented to Congress heretofore, in connection with the arguments used for the necessity of providing cheaper means of transport from the West to the Atlantic sea-board.

NOTE.—It is estimated by the best and most reliable authorities on this subject that the corn crop of these States was at least one-fourth greater in 1872 than in 1871, or any previous year. If that be a correct estimate, and of that there can be but little, if any, doubt, it amounted to the enormous aggregate of 1,349,285,175 bushels.

WHEAT PRODUCT IN 1870 AND 1871.

From the foregoing statistics, compiled from the agricultural reports at Washington, State agricultural reports, and other equally reliable sources, we find that in those twelve States the wheat product for 1870 was 178,154,000 bushels, while all other portions of the Union, including the Pacific States, produced only about 67,730,700. In 1871 the wheat crop of these States amounted to 193,876,300 bushels, all the other portions of the country producing about 78,530,000 bushels. In other words, those States, two-thirds of which are not one-sixth developed, produced more than two-thirds of the entire wheat crop of the whole country. In 1872 the wheat crop of those States amounted to about 225,000,000 bushels. In all other States, to 86,383,000 bushels.

CORN CROP FOR THE YEARS 1870 AND 1871.

In 1870 the entire corn crop of the whole country amounted to 1,094,255,000 bushels, of which those States produced 748,636,000 bushels. In 1871 the whole corn crop of the country was 1,203,680,500 bushels, of which those twelve States produced 919,323,060 bushels, leaving but 284,457,440 bushels for all the balance of the country. In 1872 those States produced about 1,349,285,175 bushels, and that, too, when several of them are not and never can be adapted to corn-raising—especially Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota—and while two others, to wit, Dakota and Nebraska, are hardly developed at all.

In a report from the Committee on Commerce, made to this House in February, 1873, by Mr. NEGLEY, he gives the estimates of the aggregate products of those States for 1872, which are substantially correct, and their probable products in 1880, simply at an increase of 10 per cent. annually, as follows:

Estimate of aggregate products and value of said States for the year 1872, based upon the reports of the Agricultural Bureau.

Wheat, 225,844,800 bushels, at 50 cents per bushel	$112,922,400

Hogs, 22,660,040 head, at $5 each	113,300,200

Sheep, 35,146,407 head, at $1.50 each	52,719,610
Wool, 70,292,814 pounds, at 40 cents per pound	28,117,125
Aggregate value	706,168,624

Estimate of aggregate products thereof in 1880, at 10 per cent. increase per annum.

Wheat, 484,794,850 bushels, at 50 cents per bushel	$242,397,425
Corn, 2,892,329,851 bushels, at 25 cents per bushel	723,082,463
Hogs, 46,894,113 head, at $5 each	234,470,565

Sheep, 74,149,492 head, at $1.50 each	111,224,238
Wool, 110,450,787 pounds, at 40 cents per pound	44,180,314
Aggregate value	1,744,482,677

Or enough almost in value to pay the national debt in a single year.

It is of course conceded that only a small portion of these products find their way over the highway of the lakes to an eastern market; yet the annual amount in value of the commerce of the lakes aggregates the enormous sum of over $1,000,000,000.

The length of Lake Superior is 390 miles, while its greatest breadth is 180 miles; Lake Michigan, 345 by 84 miles; Lake Huron, 270 by 105 miles; Lake Erie, 250 by 60 miles; and the distance from Chicago to Buffalo is 1,020 miles. It is from the city of Chicago that the great shipment of cereals is mostly made, while the vast quantities of iron and copper ore, lumber, &c., are brought from all points on the upper lakes.

But whatever may be the amount of the magnificent commerce of the lakes, either eastward to Buffalo, or westward as far as Toledo or Detroit, it all passes by the point where the harbor of refuge contemplated by these resolutions is asked to be built. And as a proof of the vital necessity of such a work, I desire to call the attention of Congress to the fact that, after leaving the Put-in-Bay Islands, there is not a natural harbor or artificial harbor of any kind which will accommodate the vessels of larger draught from Detroit to the city of Buffalo. The harbor at Cleveland, as these resolutions state, is narrow, difficult of entry, and to the largest class of vessels entirely closed. It is but two hundred feet wide at its mouth, and vessels can have no protection from violent storms until they pass within the limits guarded by the Government pier. So hazardous and so dangerous to vessels is this passage, owing to the natural defects of the harbor, that all prudent seamen avoid it, and weather the storm as they best can by remaining out in the open lake rather than court almost certain destruction by seeking refuge within the pier. It is no uncommon occurrence to see vessels endeavoring to make the harbor in rough weather, in broad daylight, strike the pier and dash themselves to pieces against its granite sides. I have seen a noble steamer, costing more than $100,000, ably manned and under the command of one of the most experienced commanders upon the lake, in the open sunlight and under full steam, strive in a violent gale to enter this harbor. But, sir, of what avail was her iron and oak, the power of her engines, or the skill of her master, against the resistless power which bore her to certain destruction? In sight of and almost within speaking distance of her own dock the mighty waves and still stronger winds seized her in their terrible grasp, and dashed her a helpless, crushed, and broken mass against the rocky bulwark built for her protection.

But, sir, the sum paid during the last ten years for insurance upon vessels and cargoes upon the lakes alone, amounting to $22,849,640, tells a fearful story of the dangers and hazards attending navigation upon these great seas, and calls loudly upon Congress to do all in its power to save such a splendid property from loss and destruction. In ten years it will be seen that almost the total value of all the vessel property at this moment owned upon the lakes has been lost by shipwreck; and it is well known that a large proportion of it would have been saved had this harbor of refuge we now desire to be built been in existence. Add to this great ruin of property the priceless value of human lives lost, amounting to more than one hundred persons annually, and the total loss of life and property becomes truly appalling.

That Cleveland is the best and most natural point between Detroit and Buffalo for a harbor of refuge is conceded by all, aside from the fact that a vast amount of the commerce of the lake goes directly to that city.

By examining a chart of Lake Erie, it will be seen that there is not a harbor of any kind between Buffalo at the east, and Point au Pelée at the northwest of Lake Erie, saving Kelly's Island, at nearly its northwest corner. The Buffalo breakwater is a noble work, though not yet completed, and vessels of any draught of water can run behind it in the worst weather and find perfect protection. Kelly's Island and Point au Pelée are natural harbors. There is also a poor harbor at Erie, behind the peninsula, that is sometimes sought by vessels in passing in rough weather. There is also a harbor at Long Point, and another about sixty-five miles west of Buffalo, on the Canada shore. The harbors at Ashtabula, Conneaut, and Fairport, east of Cleveland, and Huron and Black River, on the American shore, west, can none of them accommodate the larger class of vessels trading between Buffalo and Lake Superior ports, laden with grain and iron ore, or the still larger class of vessels which come from the ports of Lake Michigan to those of Lake Erie. Nearly all of these latest built vessels, costing for sailing-crafts from $50,000 to $60,000 each, and for steamers, from $90,000 to $160,000, and carrying from twelve to sixteen hundred tons burden, draw from thirteen to fourteen and a half feet of water.

A prominent citizen of Cleveland, who has spent most of his life upon the lakes, writes me that if the Government would construct one or two harbors of refuge, in addition to those now being built upon the lakes, where vessels drawing from eighteen to nineteen feet of water could run with safety, and capable of carrying from thirty-five hundred to four thousand tons, it would do more to solve the problem of cheap transportation than almost any one measure that could be adopted.

That we do not overestimate the importance of Cleveland as the next point west of Buffalo demanding a breakwater or harbor of refuge, I desire to call the attention of the House to the growth of that city, and also the extent of its imports and exports during the last ten years. While it is conceded to be one of the most beautiful cities of the world, I may be pardoned if I add that at this time it is, for its population, one of the richest, as well as most prosperous, in the entire country.

In the year 1800 the population of Cleveland consisted of 7 persons; in 1810, of 57; in 1820, about 150; in 1830, 1,075; in 1840, 7,648; in 1850, 20,984; in 1860, 43,838; in 1870, over 100,000; in 1874, about 140,000. Should it continue to increase in the same ratio until 1880, it is computed that the city will have a population of 262,000 souls.

From the tables herewith presented, compiled with great care by Collector Watmough, it will be seen that the number of vessels entering and clearing the Cleveland harbor during the last ten years number over eighty-one thousand. The value of cargoes entered during the same period amounts to the enormous sum of $730,274,017, and the value of cargoes cleared to the sum of $664,405,041, making a total value of about $1,400,000,000. The aggregate amount of duties collected at the same time at this custom-house is $1,229,491. I may add, although the exact figures are not before me, that there was collected and paid into the Treasury of the United States by the Cleveland district as taxes, during the first four years of the internal-revenue law, and while I was collector, the sum of about $8,000,000; while over $3,000,000 in value of petroleum was shipped in bond, to be returned in gold or its equivalent to the country.

*During the year 1870 the regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury were so modified as to make it unnecessary for vessels making Cleveland an intermediate port to report and clear; hence the apparent falling off in business at and after that date; but from information obtained from the various marine transportation companies, and other sources, it can be shown that the general commerce of the port has increased from year to year during the period covered by this statement.

This statement does not include the coal taken on board by steam craft touching at Cleveland for the purpose of coaling. The records of the custom-house do not show this item, but as Cleveland is the principal city in the Northwest for the trade in bituminous coal, the amount so exported would largely increase the total of the above exhibit.

That the House may see that Cleveland has not in any sense been a burden to the General Government, or asked for appropriations above those of her neighbor cities, I give the entire amounts expended by the Government since its origin for the improvement of sundry harbors upon the lakes. I take these figures from the office of the Secretary of War. For Buffalo, there has been expended $965,043; for Erie, $426,217; for Cleveland, $311,381; for Detroit, (Saint Clair Flats,) $625,560, and for Chicago, $865,105; with the breakwaters at Buffalo and Chicago in process of erection.

I believe that a careful review of the statistics presented must compel the conclusion that additional legislation is absolutely demanded of Congress to protect and foster the magnificent commerce of the lakes, that an additional harbor of refuge is needed upon Lake Erie, and that Cleveland is the point above all others where it should be built. The work is in no sense a local one, but one of great national importance; especially required by the people of the East and West, whose property is annually destroyed, and whose seamen are needlessly sacrificed for the want of it. Should the trade have already reached its maximum, the necessity of building a harbor of refuge at Cleveland would have been demonstrated as a measure of wise and practical economy. But, sir, as every man upon this floor realizes, that trade is in its infancy. It is destined to become the wonder of mankind. Sir, give us harbors for our vessels, and water communication from the Mississippi to the sea-board, and in a few years the mighty West will pour forth a flood of wealth that shall put to shame the fairy-tales of Aladdin, the streams whereof shall make glad the nations of the earth.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHEELER. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being demanded, the morning hour begins at twenty-eight minutes past twelve o'clock, and reports from committees of a private nature are in order.

Mr. WHEELER. I raise the question of consideration, with a view to moving that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to resume the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must appeal to the gentleman from New York not to disturb the morning hour. The morning hour ought to be maintained. Immediately at the close of it the gentleman from New York will be recognized for a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. But this is the only chance of committees being called for private reports, and should not be taken from them.

NORTH BERWICK NATIONAL BANK.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Banking and Currency to report back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 121) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue new national-bank notes to the North Berwick National Bank for mutilated bank-notes burned in mails, &c.

I desire to say that there is a general provision of law covering this case.

Mr. RANDALL. That is not a private bill.

The SPEAKER. The point having been raised, the Chair begs to say he does not think that this is a private bill.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is a bill to refund some eighty or one hundred dollars alleged to be lost.

The SPEAKER. To a banking institution?

Mr. MAYNARD. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that that would be a private bill. But as it is an adverse report, the Chair does not suppose that there would be any objection to allowing it to go upon the table.

There being no objection, the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and the same was laid upon the table.

CORRECTION.

Mr. MAYNARD. I desire permission of the House to make a simple correction in the RECORD, not as a matter of privilege or as a matter of right, but simply as information on a point on which gentlemen may be misled. In the second proviso of the third section of the bill which I reported yesterday the words, as printed in the RECORD, are:

That the entire amount of notes outstanding and in circulation at any one time shall not exceed the sum of $400,000,000, now authorized by existing laws.

It ought to read, as it is in the bill, thus: "the amount of United States notes." The words "United States" have been left out.

RICHARD H. DUTTON.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims to report back the bill (H. R. No. 21) for the relief of Richard H. Dutton, postmaster at Cavendish, Vermont, with a substitute. I move that the bill and substitute (H. R. No. 1574) be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

RICHARD H. SWIFT.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1575) for the relief of Richard H. Swift; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

REVES B. FULLER.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1576) for the relief of Reves B. Fuller, of Wilton, Maine; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Are all favorable reports ordered to be printed, as well as adverse reports?

The SPEAKER. Favorable reports are not always ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Then I ask that all reports from the Committee on Claims, whether favorable or adverse, be printed.

The SPEAKER. Adverse reports are always printed, because they are valuable as precedents.

SUSAN L. GALLOWAY.

Mr. DUNNELL, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1577) for the relief of Susan L. Galloway; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF MARTIN KALBFLEISCH.

Mr. DUNNELL also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1578) for the relief of Martin Kalbfleisch's heirs; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH J. PETRI.

Mr. DUNNELL also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1579) for the relief of Joseph J. Petri; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

HEIRS OF ASBURY DICKINS.

Mr. LANSING, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1580) for the relief of the heirs of Asbury Dickins; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CENSUS-TAKERS OF 1860.

Mr. BURROWS, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 295) to authorize the payment of the census-takers of 1860; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

GEORGE S. WRIGHT.

Mr. BURROWS also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1581) for the relief of George S. Wright, administrator of the estate of John T. Wright, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN K. MAYO.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 512) for the relief of John K. Mayo, of New York; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

B. F. WEST & CO.

Mr. SMITH, of Ohio, also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 314) to reimburse B. F. West & Co., of Martin's Ferry, Ohio, for internal-revenue stamps stolen from the post-office at Cambridge, Ohio, on the night of May 4, 1871; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

C. C. SPAIDS.

Mr. MELLISH, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1582) for the relief of C. C. Spaids; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. LAWRENCE, the Committee on War Claims was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of C. M. France, and an accompanying bill for his relief, and the memorial of Martha A. Ashburn; and the same were referred to the Committee on Claims.

CHARLES J. M'KINNEY.

Mr. KELLOGG, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1583) for the relief of Charles J. McKinney, of Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CONTAGIOUS AND INFECTIOUS DISEASES.

Mr. BROMBERG, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1584) to prevent the importation of contagious and infectious diseases into the United States; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the committee, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

HEIRS OF SETH LAMB.

INDIAN DEPREDATIONS IN OREGON AND CALIFORNIA.

Mr. AVERILL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1586) to provide for ascertaining losses sustained by citizens of Southern Oregon and Northern California, by reason of Indian depredations in 1872 and 1873; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

REMOVAL OF INDIANS.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report back the bill (H. R. No. 175) for the removal of the Alabama and Muscogee tribes of Indians from the States of Texas and Louisiana to the Creek Nation, in the Indian Territory, and to supply them for one year; and to move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Is that a private bill?

The SPEAKER. It is not; and therefore not in order under this call.

MARIE BARTON GREENE.

Mr. NESMITH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported adversely upon a memorial of Marie Barton Greene, of Massachusetts, for relief; and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM H. PILKINTON.

Mr. COBURN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1587) for the relief of William H. Pilkinton, late second lieutenant in Company G, Fifth Regiment Indiana Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the report accompanying the same ordered to be printed.

GENERAL O. O. HOWARD.

Mr. COBURN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, joint resolution H. R. No. 43, authorizing a special court of inquiry concerning General O. O. Howard.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The joint resolution, which was read, authorizes and requests the President of the United States to convene a court of inquiry, to consist of not less than five officers of the Army, whose duty it shall be, when so convened, to fully investigate all the charges against Brigadier-General O. O. Howard, contained in the communication of the Secretary of War to the Speaker of the House, of date December 5, 1873, and to report their opinion as well upon moral as upon technical and legal responsibility for such offenses, if any, as may be discovered.

Mr. DUNNELL. Is that a private bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is. The point has been raised conversationally, and some arguments have been brought forward on each side. Yet the Chair would decide that it is a private bill, and in order under this call.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to offer an amendment to the joint resolution.

Mr. COBURN. I cannot yield for an amendment, and call for the previous question.

Mr. WOODFORD. I ask that the amendment be read for the information of the House.

Mr. COBURN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to move to amend, by adding to the joint resolution the following:

Provided, That the accused may be allowed the same right of challenge as allowed by law in trials by court-martial.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. The law gives him that right.

Mr. FRYE. I believe that in courts of inquiry there is no such thing as challenge, those courts being simply to collect evidence and report it.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I do not think there is any particular harm in the amendment.

Mr. COBURN. I cannot yield for the amendment. The President makes the appointment, and how could the right of challenge be allowed?

Mr. FRYE. If the law allows the right of challenge now, it certainly can do no harm to add this amendment.

The question was upon seconding the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. COBURN and Mr. FRYE were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 74, noes 100.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. FRYE. I now offer the amendment I have indicated.

Mr. SPEER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine to inform the House what is the right of the accused upon trials by courts-martial in respect to challenge.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] tells me that he has not the Army Regulations in his hand. I happen to have them, and if he has no objection I will answer the inquiry.

Mr. FRYE. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. In reference to the organization of a court of inquiry, nothing is said about the right of challenge. As to courts-martial, article 77 in the Regulations of War provides:

When a member shall be challenged by a prisoner, he must state his cause of challenge, of which the court shall, after due deliberation, determine the relevancy or validity, and decide accordingly; and no challenge to more than one member at a time shall be received by the court.

I suppose, if a member was challenged off, then the authority that appointed the court-martial would substitute another in his place. An analogous course would be taken in this case; if General Howard should challenge off for favor a member of the court of inquiry, the President would appoint another in his place. It is rather a delicate thing for him to do, for he must challenge and state why he thinks a member would not give him that fair trial to which he is entitled. I beg leave to say that this point was not specially brought to my attention before, but I am inclined to think on its presentation now that it would be a fair thing to do.

Mr. SPEER. Who determines upon the sufficiency of the cause?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. The court of inquiry.

Mr. SPEER. Is there any limit to the challenge for cause?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I know of none, except that there can be but one member at a time challenged for cause. If one should be challenged off, then of course the court would wait until the President appointed another. Even if it should result in setting aside the whole five first appointed, there would be no injustice to the Government; and I think it is due to General Howard.

Mr. SPEER. Must General Howard be tried by officers of equal rank, or can the court be composed of officers of lower grade?

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I have not read all these provisions; but I do not recall any that covers that point.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I refer the gentleman to article 71 of the Articles of War.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I have just read article 71. The question asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SPEER] is whether any member of the court may be of lower rank than the officer upon trial.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I would like to have read all the provisions upon the subject of these courts. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] has read only one paragraph. The ninety-first Article of War explains everything.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I read from article 91:

In cases where the general or commanding officer may order a court of inquiry to examine into the nature of any transaction, accusation, or imputation against any officer or soldier, the said court shall consist of one or more officers, not exceeding three—

We thought that a court consisting of three members would not be large enough; therefore, in our resolution, we have provided for five—and a judge-advocate, or other suitable person, as a recorder, to reduce the proceedings and evidence to writing; all of whom shall be sworn to a faithful performance of their duty. This court shall have the same power to summon witnesses as a court-martial, and to examine them on oath. But they shall not give their opinion on the merits of the case, excepting they shall be thereto specially required.

Our resolution requires this court to give an opinion upon the moral, technical, and legal responsibility of this officer.

The parties accused shall also be permitted to cross-examine and interrogate the witnesses, so as to investigate fully the circumstances in the question.

The proceedings of a court of inquiry must be authenticated by the signature of the recorder and the president, and delivered to the commanding officer, and the said proceedings may be admitted as evidence by a court-martial in cases not capital or extending to the dismission of an officer, provided that the circumstances are such that oral testimony cannot be obtained. But as courts of inquiry may be perverted to dishonorable purposes, and may be considered as engines of destruction to military merit, in the hands of weak and envious commandants, they are hereby prohibited, unless directed by the President of the United States, or demanded by the accused.

Mr. SPEER. Will not the court provided for by this resolution have authority only to inquire and report, not to try and convict? If this is so, there is not the same reason for the right of challenge in this case as in the case of an ordinary trial by court-martial.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. These questions ought to be answered rather by the chairman of the committee than by myself. I merely rose to answer a special inquiry, because I held the book in my hand.

Mr. SPEER. Then I direct my inquiry to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. Perhaps I may be permitted to answer upon this point as well as I may, and the chairman of the committee can afterwards add anything he may deem proper. It is of very little consequence to General Howard, in one view of the case, whether this court shall dismiss him from the Army or shall not dismiss him. The essential thing to him with reference to his standing in the Army or his standing in the world is the judgment of this court upon his moral and professional responsibility in this matter. Hence I think it a fair thing to give him a right to challenge.

Mr. SPEER. I now direct my inquiry to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. COBURN.]

Mr. COBURN. What is the inquiry?

Mr. SPEER. Whether the court of inquiry provided for by this joint resolution will have the power to try and convict, or only to inquire and report?

Mr. COBURN. The only power they would have under the Army Regulations would be to inquire and report testimony. If the order convening the court required them to give an opinion, they would have to do so, in addition to reporting the testimony. This resolution requires the court of inquiry to inquire and report: they are not to make any finding; they are merely to report an opinion as to the responsibility of this officer, not only technically and legally, but morally; but they are to make no finding aside from this expression of an opinion. Ordinarily a court of inquiry would only report the evidence, just like a commissioner to take depositions.

Mr. SPEER. The report will be made to the President?

Mr. COBURN. The report will be made to the President, of course, as the authority convening the court.

Mr. FRYE. I understand, Mr. Speaker, and the House must also have understood, from the reading of the joint resolution reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, that this court of inquiry differs entirely from an ordinary military court of inquiry. If the resolution be passed, this court will be instructed to make a finding not only as to the technical or legal responsibility, but also as to the moral responsibility of General Howard. It is to have nearly all the latitude of a court-martial. The reputation of General Howard being involved in the finding of this court of inquiry, the amendment I submit to the House asks only that he shall have the same right of challenge that is allowed to the accused in cases tried before courts-martial. This is a right of challenge for cause only, not a peremptory challenge. In no State of the Union, so far as I know, is a man charged with crime, as General Howard is charged here, put upon trial without being allowed the right of challenge for cause, and in most States a peremptory challenge is also allowed.

Now, sir, the friends of General Howard, of whom I count myself one—a firm friend, upon whom he can rely always until convicted by a fair and impartial tribunal—the friends of General Howard themselves ask for a court of inquiry. But they want it to be fair; they want it to be righteous; they want it to be just, and they will insist upon this; they will be content with nothing less.

I have known General Howard, sir, always, he having been born in the county adjoining my own. I have known him in his school-boy days. He was a class-mate of mine in the college where we received our education. I have known him intimately, I have known him well. I was on Meridian Hill when he marched with his regiment through the storm to the protection of the country. I was with him shortly after his arm was lost, before the wound was healed; we were together fighting on the stump to raise troops, he in sickness and weakness of body, but with a spirit undaunted, full of faith. I was with him after the war was over, and I followed him in history all through the war. I know him well; and I say, sir, that from childhood up till to-day I have never known a flaw, a stain, a shadow, upon the Christian character of Oliver O. Howard. In his boyhood he was bright, and honest, and pure. In his college life he put me to shame again and again by the pure and noble life he led. In the Army—and there lies the secret—his life, his every-day walk, was a constant reminder and reproach to hundreds of Army officers who had charge of the destinies of our soldiers. Since the war has been over I have not known a single stain, and I do not believe there is a single stain, that any court of inquiry or any court-martial, fairly constituted, can fasten upon him. I stake my life, my reputation—all that I hold dear in life—upon the finding of an honestly-constituted court-martial or court of inquiry.

Sir, the friends of General Howard do not shrink from this inquiry, neither does General Howard himself. To show you that I am speaking words of soberness and truth, I ask the Clerk to read the following communication which I have received from General Howard; and when it has been read before the House, I trust there is sufficient fairness here, in the trial of so noble a man as history has written General Howard to be, and a sufficient sense of justice, to give him the same rights that every accused man is entitled to by the laws of the land.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, January 21, 1874.

DEAR SIR: As you represent the district where I was born, and where I lived until I became connected with the Army of the United States, I feel at liberty to ask a favor of you.

Should the report of the Committee upon Military Affairs recommend the appointment by the President of a military court to investigate the charges made against me by the honorable Secretary of War, and also to determine whether or not my official administration of financial affairs has been either legally or morally wrong, I would like to have you say, that knowing my own innocence of any conscious wrong act or violation of law, and desirous of having my military and personal character established at the earliest possible moment, I am ready and willing to commit myself at once to the judgment of such a court.

At the same time, I hope that the court may not be appointed or its proceedings reviewed by the honorable Secretary of War, since he has made the charges against me; and I would like, for obvious reasons, the privilege of challenge, as in ordinary courts-martial. The objections hitherto made by me to a military court do not apply to one constituted as I have indicated as likely to be reported by the committee.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

O. O. HOWARD.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE, M. C.

Mr. COBURN. What is the date of that?

Mr. FRYE. January 21, 1874.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] a question.

Mr. FRYE. I will hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I should judge from the remarks of the gentleman from Maine that he has some reason to suppose that the President of the United States is prejudiced against General Howard, and is prepared to appoint a court to convict him.

Mr. FRYE. I understood the gentleman desired to ask a question.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Very well. Has the gentleman any information or reason to believe that the President is prejudiced against General Howard, or that he will appoint a court prejudiced against General Howard, and prepared to enter upon their duties in prejudice against him?

Mr. FRYE. The question is entirely unnecessary. I have given no intimation of anything of the kind. On the contrary, both General Howard, and I as a friend of General Howard, have unlimited confidence in the President of the United States. But, sir, the President cannot know men's hearts. He cannot know the jealousies that have arisen or the rivalries that have sprung up so well as the accused himself. I intended no reflection upon the President or upon any officer of the Army by the remarks which I made.

I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.]

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to offer a substitute for the resolution reported by the committee?

The SPEAKER. The position of the resolution is, that the House having refused to second the previous question, enables the gentleman from Maine to offer his amendment. The gentleman from Maine is now on the floor, and while he occupies the floor no amendment can be offered without his consent. The gentleman will say whether he yields to the gentleman from New York for an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. FRYE. I do not.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. May not the substitute proposed by the gentleman from New York be read?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is at liberty to make it part of his remarks.

Mr. WOOD. I will refer to what I desire to accomplish by it.

My relations to the origin of these charges against General Howard compel me at this time, inasmuch as the gentleman from Maine has gone away from the immediate question for the purpose of referring to the question of guilt, to address some remarks to the House. Had he not done so I should have kept my seat and offered no remarks to the House; although I am not in favor of the resolution as presented by the committee, because, in my judgment, it is very far short of the action that is required at the present moment.

I desire to say that, so far as General Howard is concerned, I have no unkind feelings toward him. To me, personally, he is a stranger. He has never injured me so far as I know, and anything I may have done in reference to the charges made against him has been done simply, singly, and purely in the discharge of what I deem to be my duty as a member of this House. I need not, sir, refer to the origin of these charges made by myself on this floor. They were fifteen in number, comprehending not only everything that is now communicated by the Secretary of War, who has renewed those charges, but going very far outside of that, and reaching moral guilt of the highest turpitude. Those charges were referred to a committee of this House. That committee investigated them to a limited extent, and made their report to this House. The result we all know, and it is not necessary to refer to the fact that the House did exonerate General Howard from the charges I made against him, entirely exonerating him and presenting him to the people of the United States as an injured man, and as a pure, good man, and Christian statesman and soldier. Sir, let that pass. General Howard said then, as he says now, to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] "I am ready, and desire inquiry;" and after quibbling and avoiding, during that investigation, every possible inquiry that could be made; after inducing witnesses to absent themselves from the court-room by threats, by coaxing, by efforts to intimidate, and the other means used in courts of justice to prevent the truth from coming out, yet he told us and he told the world he was ready for inquiry. And, again, when the Secretary of War first called on him to answer as to certain accounts growing out of the closing up of the Freedmen's Bureau, he said, "I am ready for inquiry;" but down to this hour he has always avoided inquiry, and he will yet prevaricate and evade and interpose every technical objection to avoid, if he can, final inquiry and final punishment.

Now, sir, this resolution, allow me to say, as it comes from the committee, is directly in the line of avoidance of inquiry. These gentlemen know, as well as we all know, that under existing law a court of inquiry cannot be convened; that it cannot be done until that existing law shall be altered, amended, or abolished. A court of inquiry must consist of three members; and such a court of inquiry can, under ordinary circumstances, be called by the President of the United States, without the intervention of Congress, under existing law; and the only reason why that course has not been adopted is, that there has been some doubt in the mind of the Secretary of War whether the circumstances out of which these charges arise, having occurred long since, and not within the time within which such inquiry could be had, he had the power to institute such court.

Now, we all know that if we pass this resolution it must go to the Senate for concurrence and there must be delay, whereas a simple House resolution, calling upon the President of the United States to institute a court of inquiry in the case, is all that is required, if gentlemen really desire that General Howard should have an opportunity to meet these charges. I hold in my hand a resolution which I desire to offer as a substitute for the resolution reported by the Military Committee, and which I will read as a portion of my remarks. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the President be requested to convene a court of inquiry into the charges made against General O. O. Howard by the Secretary of War, and General Vincent, and Adjutant-General Townsend.

It is not necessary to make it a joint resolution, which would be subject to long delay in the Senate, where it might finally be submerged in the necessity of hasty legislation, growing out of the closing of the session. The resolution of the committee is exactly in the line that General Howard has pursued. He stands before the world as an innocent man desiring investigation, but he interposes to prevent by every available means the possibility of an investigation. I hope that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] will allow me to test the sense of the House upon my resolution as a substitute for that reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FRYE. I decline to yield for that purpose.

Mr. WOOD. I desire to inquire whether, if the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, consents to my offering this amendment, the gentleman from Maine can prevent it?

The SPEAKER. The attitude of the case is this: The House refused to second the demand for the previous question on the resolution reported from the committee by the opposition of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] who desired to offer his amendment. That, under the rules of the House, gives him a right to the floor to offer his amendment and also a right to test the sense of the House whether the previous question shall be seconded. When he shall move the previous question, if the House shall decline to second it, it will be the duty of the Chair to recognize the gentleman from New York to try his substitute. The whole matter is within the control of a majority of the House.

Mr. FRYE. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOODFORD.]

Mr. WOODFORD. Mr. Speaker, it is now nearly thirteen years since a regiment from Maine, under the command of then Colonel Oliver O. Howard, marched through the city of New York, on its way to the front. By the courtesy of the citizens of Maine resident in New York I was permitted at that time, in their behalf, to present the standard which the regiment bore, and which it brought home all shot-riddled and honored. We then pledged to those men, and we pledged to their colonel, that we would stand by them in the struggle on which they entered. Years passed, and he who was one of the early colonels of the war was permitted, under Providence, to become a leader in that movement which placed the musket in the hands of the slave, and lifted the downtrodden black man up to the full stature of manhood and American citizenship. You and I know how slander and the shaft of venom have followed Oliver O. Howard from that time until now. You and I, Mr. Speaker, have heard even this morning that the suggestions of Christian statesmanship and of the Christian soldier are sneeringly and tauntingly urged upon this floor. Sir, if Christian statesmanship has suffered wrong, so much the worse for those who have used the name of the Master to cover crime. If Christian soldiership has suffered wrong, so much the worse for those who have used the sacred name to shield cowardice or conceal crime. But there never was an hour when sincere and earnest Christian statesmanship and Christian manhood were so needed in this country and on this floor as to-day.

It is known by all that the statute of limitation had practically run against many of the offenses which are charged upon Oliver O. Howard. You and I also know that he, of his own generosity, has waived all his claim on that ground and submitted the entire case. You and I know that courts of inquiry are generally directed to ascertaining legal guilt. But this resolution which has been here introduced requires this court of inquiry "to report their opinion as well upon moral as upon technical and legal responsibility." This inquiry is to go to the very root and essence of the whole matter. And there is not a gentleman on this floor but knows that the finding of this court will be the ultimate judgment of large masses of the people of this country.

There is no friend of General Howard who holds him so dear that he would shield him if wrong. All that we insist upon is, that in a case that will involve the trial of some political questions, which will arouse some jealousies of race and of section, there shall be an impartial court and an absolute investigation, in order that justice may be done between Oliver O. Howard and his accusers. We plead for simple justice; we ask for no delay.

If my memory serves me right, some sixty-three days were occupied in the investigation before the committee which had under consideration the resolutions and the accusations presented by the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.] If my memory serves me right, the honorable gentleman from New York occupied sixty of those days, and the accused, General Howard, occupied three of the sixty-three days. The committee confounded the accuser and cleared the accused. Simple justice is all that we ask. That justice the nation demands for one who has borne an honored name, and whose fame is part and parcel of the heritage of the whole land.

Mr. FRYE. I now yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COBURN. It may be well that the minds of the House shall be cleared a little after the declamation we have heard in relation to the character and services of General Howard. No man goes before me in respect personally for General Howard and for his services or his character. But what earthly reason there can now be for discussing his character or his services or his merits, as a soldier and citizen, I, as a member of the republican party and a radical republican, having always been one, cannot see. What he was, what he is, what is his history, his renown, is aside from the question before the House.

We are here now to settle the simple question as to whether the President shall have power, unlimited by this resolution, to appoint the court of inquiry, or whether General Howard shall have given him, in express terms and in an unprecedented way, the right to challenge such persons as he desires. That is all there is in it. I have confidence that the President will, judiciously and fairly and honestly—I will say further than that, that he will kindly—appoint a court in this matter; and that whatever may be the right of the accused generally to challenge members of the court is not affected by an omission in this resolution.

What relation does the President bear to General Howard? A companion in arms; a man whose fame is common with his in all the transactions of which Howard or the republicans of this country are proud. His glory is inseparable from the glory of General Howard.

And his management of the Freedmen's Bureau, as the executive officer of the United States—for the President of the United States had the management of the Freedmen's Bureau, as had General Howard, in a general sense—his management of the Freedmen's Bureau was identified at every step of its progress with the management of General Howard, and if he is to be condemned, the President is to be condemned side by side with him; that is inevitable. And if disgrace is to be brought upon General Howard and upon the republican party by his management of the Freedmen's Bureau, it attaches to the very man who is to constitute this commission.

Why, then, all this declamation about what General Howard has done? Why this demand of this House that "the fair thing shall be done;" that "justice shall be done?"

Who proposes to do anything unfair? Who proposes to do anything unkind? Who proposes to do anything unjust? Who proposes to do anything unreasonable? Why should there be clamor here to-day for kind and just and reasonable action? The resolution now before the House comes from men who are friendly to General Howard; and as the letter dated the 21st instant has been read, I will tell the House something of a more recent date that has been communicated from General Howard. No longer ago than yesterday, as I sat in this seat, with the joint resolution in my hand, I had a conversation with him upon this very matter; and he told me that the resolution suited him—that it might be passed without objection. He told me that he would go to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] who some days ago suggested an amendment that a majority of the court should consist of officers who had been in command of colored troops, that he would tell the gentleman from Massachusetts he did not desire an amendment of that kind; that he was willing the resolution should be passed by the House in the form agreed on by the committee.

Now, if the friends of General Howard—his special, self-constituted friends—desire to do more for him than he asks for himself, in Heaven's name, let it be done. I count myself also among his friends. But for the fact that that letter was read at the Clerk's desk I would not have repeated in the presence of this House what was said by him to me in relation to this matter. But I feel that any action of the House to-day limiting the power of the President in making these appointments, by allowing to the accused the right of challenge, would be an imputation upon the President himself. While I believe the proposition has not been offered in any such spirit—far be it from me to say that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] or any other gentleman who favors this proposition intended anything of that kind—the adoption of such a provision would, in the opinion of the thinking men throughout the country, be construed as an expression of lack of confidence in the President of the United States—in his fairness, his sense of justice, his kindly feeling toward one of the most distinguished men that served in our Army during the war. It is a useless provision at best, containing what is found nowhere else in the laws authorizing courts of inquiry.

As to my own position in this matter, I will say (because it is all about to be made public) that I am one of those who have been in favor of this body making the investigation, instead of having it made by a court of inquiry. While I am not among those who have thought the latter the most advisable tribunal, I say if we must have a court of inquiry, if we must submit this matter to military men, who ought, in my judgment, never to have had jurisdiction of it, let us trust the President of the United States in making the appointment of the court; let us repose some confidence in him; let us not expressly threaten him with challenges in advance. If any gentleman has any apprehension that the Secretary of War may have undue influence in the appointments, let me say that I have the best authority in the world for stating that the Secretary of War will have nothing whatever to do with the appointment of this commission, the conduct of the investigation, or the report that the court may make. The court will be solely under the direction of the President. I have confidence in him; I desire to intrust him with the responsibility in this matter. I insist that the resolution ought to be passed as reported, without threat, warning, or caution against the President.

Mr. FRYE. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER.]

Mr. SPEER. Will the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] allow me to have an amendment read?

Mr. FRYE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPEER. I think the amendment I send to the Clerk's desk will obviate the objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That when a challenge shall be made, its sufficiency shall be determined by the President, upon the reasons publicly assigned by the accused.

Mr. SPEER. This amendment will allow the President, instead of the court, to determine the sufficiency of the challenge.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I would not trouble the House on this question but for the fact that in going about the House I have heard gentlemen say that this is like an inquiry by a grand jury, and I have been asked more than once whether in the courts of the United States there is a right of challenge as regards a grand jury. Upon that point, I wish to say that in the most important case that ever came before a court of the United States—the case of Aaron Burr upon trial for treason at Richmond, where Chief Justice Marshall presided in person—this question was debated. After the argument the district attorney admitted the right of challenge at common law; the court decided that the accused should have the right; and he did challenge two of the grand jurors. Since this question arose, I have sent for the book and have refreshed my memory as to the facts.

I want to say further that I do not regard the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] as an imputation upon the President, any more than I would look upon a challenge of a grand juror as an imputation upon the marshal who had the right of selection. He may have selected men generally regarded by him as "good and true men;" yet it may turn out that in the case of some particular juror there may be some personal partiality or enmity, or, as happened in one case in my own State, one of the grand jurors may have been formerly convicted of crime—a fact unknown to the officers of the court until brought out by strict inquiry on the part of the accused. Under these circumstances I do not look upon this as implicating the President or bringing any distrust upon him.

Now let me say, what is due to my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, as well as to General Howard, that General Howard came to me and said that he did not desire that I should press my amendment to the resolution, that three officers of the colored troops shall sit upon the court of inquiry; that he was satisfied with the resolution; that he had no doubt the President would do right. But while I could easily see that he was perfectly satisfied that it would not be proper, courteous, modest, or in good taste for him to object to any tribunal that his superior officer, the President of the United States, might choose, and while he felt a delicacy, undoubtedly, in asking to have this provision put in, as I should had I been in his place, still the question is not one for General Howard or for the President, but it is a question of precedent in the administration of public justice. This court of inquiry makes an indictment; nay, further, it makes a decision; and all that anybody asks is that it shall be a fair tribunal. And I know that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, if the matter had been brought to his attention before he reported the resolution, would have seen no objection to it; and he now feels that he is treated a little unkindly in being thought to be opposed to General Howard, and unfriendly to him.

But is there really any objection to this proposition? If it should so turn out that one of the officers innocently and properly selected by the President had cause of personal grievance against General Howard, would anybody desire that he should be tried by his personal enemy? But we can suppose a case of one who had stated an adverse opinion. If he should know that an officer—which the President might not know—had said, "I believe General Howard to be guilty; all the evidence in the world would not convince me of his innocence;" would you desire him to be tried by such an officer? Yet the officer might be a very honorable man. Take General Hooker. If one might believe the newspapers, which I do not always believe—if the President believed he had already expressed in public the opinion which he is said to have expressed, of course he would not choose him. Suppose some other officer had expressed the same opinion privately, would the chairman of the Military Committee or anybody else, friend or enemy of General Howard, desire he should be tried by an officer so circumstanced? Clearly not. This only gives a right of challenge for cause, to be decided by the remaining unchallenged portion of the court.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. If an hour is allowed after the seconding of the previous question, I should like to have a portion of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] would be entitled to the hour.

Mr. COBURN. I desire that some other gentlemen should have the opportunity of expressing their views. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HAWLEY,] if the Chair accords me the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no discretion in the matter.

Mr. COBURN. The gentleman from Illinois may have five or ten minutes.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] will not manifest too much impatience. Certainly any debate on this matter was not precipitated on this House by the Committee on Military Affairs. There was no disposition whatever shown by that committee, or any member of it, to discuss this joint resolution. But it seems to me, from the discussion which has taken place here this morning, that it is sought by some to lead the House and the country to suppose that the Military Committee, or some portion of it, is not friendly to General Howard. Now, I believe I may say that as far as I know, and I think I am now in a position to know the sentiments of all the members of the committee, since this question has been under discussion there is not a member of that committee who is unfriendly to General Howard, or would see any injustice done to him.

The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs stated that if he had had his own way he would have had this investigation conducted by a committee of this House. I would have opposed that. I am in favor of this resolution with the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Maine; and I think if General Howard had suggested to the committee that he desired such a provision to be placed in the resolution there is not a man upon that committee who would have opposed it. It never occurred to me, and I think it never occurred to any gentleman upon the committee; but when it is suggested I see the propriety of it and think it should be adopted. And I am sure a majority of the committee, so far as I can judge from the way in which the majority of the members of the committee have expressed themselves, are in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Maine.

Now the case, in my judgment, occupies a very different position from that of ordinary cases that may come before courts of inquiry. There are special considerations applicable to this case. It is a very important one. It has attracted very wide notice throughout the country. Everybody in the country is interested in it. General Howard has handled—he and his subordinates—millions of money, and everybody is looking now to the inquiry which shall be conducted in regard to it, particularly after what the Secretary of War has said in his letter to Congress.

It appeared to the Committee on Military Affairs that he should be tried by his peers; that being an officer of the Army very high in authority and command, he should be tried as other military officers are tried, by those whose verdict, after they shall have rendered it, will carry weight one way or the other. If the case should be investigated by Congress again there may be a great deal of dissatisfaction with the result, let Congress or the committee decide one way or the other; but if he shall submit to being tried, as he is willing to do, by his peers, having five Army officers to try him, he can go with confidence before that tribunal, and the country will look upon the decision of that tribunal as a settlement of the questions involved.

I do not hesitate to say, sir, that I am a friend of General Howard. I wish to see him have a fair trial, and I would be as unwilling and reluctant as any man in the world to see him put before a tribunal that would not do him justice; but after a careful consideration of the question, I have come to the conclusion, as a majority of the committee have done, that this is the fairest and best way of proceeding, and the only necessity for this joint resolution is that it is proposed to increase the number of the court from three to five, which, I think, is very wise and prudent, and which I hope Congress will adopt. As I said before, I am heartily in favor of the resolution, with the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.]

Mr. FRYE. I yield now for ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. DONNAN.]

Mr. DONNAN. Mr. Speaker, no man in this House is more heartily pleased than myself to listen to the laudations of General O. O. Howard. No man in this country who reads its history for centuries to come will forget his memory. But the question now is whether we shall go into an examination relative to certain charges which have been preferred against him, or whether we shall refer the case to a court of inquiry of his peers in the organization in which he serves.

It has been intimated here that he stands charged before his country by the Secretary of War. I ask the members of this House to consider for a moment how this matter happened to come before the committee of which I am a member. It is now three years since there were charges made against this officer for his conduct in the Freedmen's Bureau. An investigating committee of Congress examined those charges and exculpated him. What was the result? Was the country satisfied? Were the members of the opposition in this House satisfied? On the contrary, in the very next Congress we found similar charges preferred by members of the opposition here, and a demand for further investigation. The matter passed over during the last Congress, and scarcely had we been seated in the present Congress before like charges were again preferred by a member of this body, and a demand made that the House should go into another investigation with reference to them, or that a court of inquiry should be ordered to try him. Now, it was because the last Congress preferred additional charges against this officer that the Secretary of War felt it to be his duty, in response to the action of Congress and in response to complaints that were being made, to submit the question to Congress for its consideration. General Howard, in his recent letter which was published to the country about a month ago, intimates that the Secretary of War is the person who stands charging him with crime before the country. Not at all. No man who listened to the kind sentiments expressed toward this officer by the Secretary of War before the Committee on Military Affairs would for one moment doubt that the kindest possible relations exist between the two. But the Secretary of War like myself, and I hope like every other member on the floor, feels not only confidence in General Howard, but a sincere wish in the depth of his heart that this matter may be fully investigated, and General Howard not only exonerated but fully exculpated before the House and the country.

A word now as to the action of the committee. After mature deliberation it was decided by the committee that, with the amount of business on its hands, and in view of the fact that a former committee had gone through an investigation the result of which proved unsatisfactory and had only resulted in producing additional charges, if the committee should undertake the investigation and exculpate General Howard, charges would still be made by the minority on this floor and the minority in the country that there had only yet been a whitewashing report. It was believed by the Committee on Military Affairs—and I believe I may say that every member of that committee is extremely friendly to General Howard, and hopes his character may stand unblemished before the country; it was believed that in justice to him, in justice to the country, in justice to the Christian Church, who demand that no member of its organization, standing in a position of high influence and responsibility, shall stand accused of charges of misconduct before the world without having an absolutely fair, but at the same time thorough investigation; I say it was believed by the committee best to recommend the appointment of a court of inquiry, who should sift these charges to the bottom. At the suggestion of the officer against whom the charges are made, the committee agreed to authorize the court to examine into any charges of moral misconduct, as well as technical official misconduct.

As to the amendment which has been offered by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] I would like to ask him whether it is offered at the request of General Howard? I do not understand it to be asked in the letter which has been read. This officer stated to the committee that he was entirely satisfied with their recommendations. I have only this objection to the amendment offered: it was suggested by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] that it was an unheard-of thing that there should be a court of inquiry appointed without giving this officer the right to challenge, because this court of inquiry is required to report their opinion. Sir, that is provided for in the military law. Ever since military law was established in this country, courts of inquiry may, at the suggestion of the officer appointing them, be required to report their opinions upon any question submitted to them. This case does not stand upon any different ground from any ordinary court of inquiry. The only difference is that it is to be composed of five instead of three officers.

In my judgment it is unwise for the friends of General Howard to ask that he be made an exception to the rule applying to other officers of the Army; to ask that he shall have the right of challenge which no other officer of the Army is permitted to demand in his own behalf; to ask that he shall be permitted to challenge a court of inquiry to investigate facts. I believe that it is for General Howard's interest, that it is best for his character, if he shall be exculpated, as I hope he will be, that no court of inquiry shall be summoned differing in any regard from one regularly appointed by military authority.

For this reason I hope the House will not change the resolution as reported by the Military Committee; that they will not make the case of General Howard an exceptional case; that they will show to the country that they are willing and desirous to place themselves where General Howard himself says he wants them to place themselves, in favor of an investigation before a court organized by the President, who, as the chairman of the committee says, will deal justly, fairly, and honestly in the organization of this court.

I doubt whether you can find an officer in the United States Army but what would prefer to be tried by his peers rather than in any other manner. And I think if you were to ask the general officers of the Army if they wished to be made exceptions to the general rule applicable to a court of inquiry, they would say they wished to stand precisely in the same position in which officers of the Army are compelled to stand when their conduct is undergoing investigation.

I hope this amendment will not be adopted. I believe a court of inquiry of five officers, summoned by the President, declared by General Howard himself to be satisfactory to him, will do him substantial justice. And there is no man here, there is no man who ever attended college with him, or ever served under him, or is nearest to him in friendship, who will rejoice more heartily than myself if that court of inquiry shall absolutely exculpate him from all blame in this matter.

Mr. COBURN. I now yield to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. THORNBURGH.]

Mr. THORNBURGH. I am one of the members of the Committee on Military Affairs of this House who believe that that committee is the proper tribunal to investigate this whole matter. Grave and serious charges have been made against General Howard by the Secretary of War. The duties upon which General Howard was engaged at the time the public moneys are said to have been squandered were not purely of a military character. Under a special law of Congress he was assigned to duties which were, to say the least of them, of a civil as well as a military character.

The Committee on Military Affairs is composed of gentlemen who have not only had some experience in military matters and military law, but gentlemen who have been engaged in the practice of the profession of law, and who are familiar with investigating subjects of this character. I earnestly desire a full, fair, and thorough investigation of this whole matter, with men of both political parties to make that examination, a committee acquainted with military law, and men who have made the study and practice of law the profession of their lives. With such men I think we can have a full, fair, and thorough investigation, with such a report upon the facts as will do General Howard justice and satisfy the country that Congress has done its duty in regard to the charges against him. I would be glad to see this whole subject referred back to the committee, with instructions to investigate it and report to the House.

I cannot now, in the present attitude of the question before the House, enter a motion I desire to submit. But if this amendment should be voted down, and the gentleman from Indiana, the chairman of the committee, [Mr. COBURN,] will yield the floor to me, I will then move that this whole question be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, to fully investigate and report upon all matters involved.

Mr. COBURN. I now yield to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] for five minutes.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I shall trouble the House for as brief a period as possible. I propose not to begin by saying whether I am a special friend of General Howard or not, for that is not the question. I propose not to begin by a eulogy upon his brilliant military services, for that is not the question. I am anxious for two things: first, that he shall have a thorough trial; and, next, that there shall be a complete and unlimited investigation of the whole range of charges submitted by the Secretary of War, in justice to him, in justice to the country, and in justice to the House of Representatives. That is all that I shall speak to.

It was first proposed that there should be an investigation by the Committee on Military Affairs. At the first blush I thought favorably of that proposition. But it afterward occurred to me, and it is now my conviction, that it is best not to have the investigation conducted by that committee. Why? I do not distrust the ability or the fairness of that tribunal. For myself individually I should be willing to be tried by the Committee on Military Affairs; and I doubt not General Howard would be. But I do not care, so far as this case is concerned, whether he would or would not. That committee is composed, with a single exception, of men who have served in the Army on one side or the other; and whichever side they may have fought upon, I would trust them to decide honestly this case, according to the standard of professional honor as recognized in every army that I know anything about.

But what would be the result if that committee should try the case? Suppose the committee should acquit the accused entirely? General Howard's case would be as unsettled as it is now. A large portion of the country would turn upon us with the reproach that the tribunal making the examination was simply a "whitewashing" committee of political partisans. Now, while ordinarily, in the performance of what seems to be duty, I prefer to go on and do my duty scorning such charges, I think it really better for General Howard, and the Army, and the committee, and the House, that we should now fix upon such a tribunal that nobody can have an excuse for finding fault with its verdict. We propose therefore to remit the whole case of General Howard to the President, the proper authority in all such cases, that he may appoint a court of inquiry, as provided for in the Army Regulations.

It is true we make some little deviation from the ordinary method of conducting courts of inquiry. In the first place, however, we do not limit the investigation in any way. We give to General Howard and the Government a wider field of inquiry than there would be under an ordinary court-martial. Before such a tribunal the investigation is usually confined to an examination of direct charges and specifications. In this resolution we authorize the court of inquiry to take the whole body of evidence and charges submitted by the Secretary of War, and make a general examination. It seems to me that this ought to be satisfactory to everybody, whether a friend or an enemy of General Howard. Whatever may be the belief of any man in the justice or the injustice of this case, it must be conceded that there can be nothing fairer than this unlimited investigation.

It has also been thought proper by the committee that in this exceptional case the court should consist of five officers rather than three. Does not this proposition commend itself to the unprejudiced judgment of every member of this House? Is not the court likely to be a fairer, more satisfactory tribunal, if it be composed of five experienced Army officers than if it should consist of only three? I think that clearly the resolution is right in this respect.

Then, as to the right of challenge. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER,] and other gentlemen whose opinions on questions of law are entitled to great respect, have shown that there is a right of challenge even in the case of an ordinary grand jury. Indeed, I cannot suppose that there can be any legal tribunal, final or preparatory, that cannot be reached by some sort of challenge for favor. Indeed, many able lawyers would hold (and I have the opinion of one such who sits near me) that the right of challenge pertains even to a court of inquiry, because members of the court take this oath:

> You shall well and truly examine and inquire, according to your evidence, into the matter now before you, without partiality, favor, affection, prejudice, or hope of reward. So help you God.

Now, suppose a person on trial before such a court should know perfectly well that some member of the court, appointed in good faith by the commanding officer, had expressed a decided opinion or had a prejudice against the accused, would there not be, even in a court of inquiry, the right of challenge? I am inclined to think there would be; and though I do not know the precedents, there are lawyers around me who I think would compel a court of inquiry in such a case, under the law as it now stands, to admit the right of challenge. But as the right is not entirely certain, why should we not assure it in this case by a specific provision?

But there is an additional reason for giving that right in this case. We propose to give this court of inquiry a wider scope than it would have ordinarily under the law. The ordinary provision is that "they shall not give their opinion on the merits of the case excepting they shall be thereto specially required." We propose to require that this court shall express an opinion, not alone upon the legal or pecuniary responsibility of General Howard for any squandering of public money that may have occurred in the management of the Freedmen's Bureau, but also upon his moral guilt. We provide that his whole standing as a man, as a soldier, and as an accounting officer, shall be investigated; and we propose that this investigation shall be conducted by five regular Army officers.

One word as to the reflection which this amendment is supposed to imply upon the President of the United States. I shall not say whether or not I know anything of the President's opinions upon this matter from any conversations with him; but I have the same unlimited confidence as the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] that the President of the United States, knowing this officer and having a high regard at the same time for the professional honor and integrity of the Army, will hold the scales evenly, and will, so far as it may be within his power, appoint a fair court. But he may not know everything in regard to the character or opinions of the men whom he appoints; and it seems to me perfectly right that the accused, if he knows something upon this point that the President does not know, should be allowed to specify it as a ground for challenge; for he can only challenge for favor.

Mr. COBURN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR.]

Mr. LAMAR. I shall not need more than a moment or two to state the reason which controls my vote on this amendment. I am not the friend of General Howard, nor am I conscious of being in any sense his foe. By no act, nor vote, nor wish of mine will the luster of his fame, either civil or military, be ever wantonly tarnished. With regard to his guilt or innocence of the offenses charged upon him I have no opinion except the general inclination of my mind to discredit charges made against men occupying high and responsible stations. But I would respectfully submit that when such charges are made, emanating as these do from a source so exalted, it is far better for his reputation that such accusations should be met by a calm, serene, and dignified demand for a prompt and public trial rather than by rhetorical laudations on the part of his friends of his past career.

Now, sir, with regard to this amendment. My opinion is, that a party accused before a military court of inquiry has the right to challenge a member of that court for cause. The military law in this country and in England is subordinate to the civil and municipal laws. The general principles of jurisprudence are supreme, and the soldier does not lose his rights as a citizen. The right of an accused to challenge for cause any member of a tribunal before whom he is brought for trial is a right inherent in the principles of public law, peculiar to no one country, but of universal application to criminal trials and investigations whether preliminary or final. No regulation or special statute has been cited subversive of this right.

But, sir, if this principle of common and public law has been superseded by any special regulation or custom obtaining in the conduct of these preliminary military trials, I think there should be no departure from that regulation in the proposed inquiry. Arbitrary, unjust, and harsh as such a rule (if it exist) must be, if it is the law General Howard should not be specially exempted from its operation. Any attempt made by his friends to vary his trial from the regular and established procedure will subject the accused and the proceeding alike to grave misconstruction, and will break the value and force of that acquittal and vindication which have been so confidently predicted by his eulogists in this debate.

However elevated in position, or brilliant in his career, or useful in his services to his country, he ought not to be placed above the law; nor should the stringency of its rules be relaxed for his benefit.

Opposed, therefore, to any special legislation—any special favor—I shall vote against this amendment; believing, however, that as a general principle the right of challenge attaches to an accused in these trials, especially in view of the fact that no rule or special provision forbidding or depriving him of such a right has been produced in this discussion.

Mr. COBURN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND.]

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. Speaker, I would not have participated in this debate had it not been for a remark made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD,] that though an investigation had been made some time ago by a committee of this House, of which I was a member, that investigation was only a limited one. My own self-respect and the justice that is due to the remainder of the committee, the greater portion of whom have passed away from this House, require me to say that the charges which have been made by the gentleman from New York, charging a limited investigation, or any limitation on the part of anybody connected with that investigation, are not founded in fact.

The committee appointed on that occasion to listen and adjudge upon the fifteen counts in the indictment of the gentleman from New York against General Howard, sat with great patience for sixty-three days, as has already been stated to the House by the gentleman's colleague from the city of Brooklyn. There was given to the gentleman from New York who preferred these charges the greatest power of the Government so as to secure the largest liberty of investigation. It conferred upon him all the authority that this House could give. It gave him the services of the Sergeant-at-Arms. It issued subpœnas, and enabled him to range the country from one end to the other. He had everything in the way of an opportunity for a varied and extended investigation that any accuser could require. He summoned witnesses wherever he thought proper. He brought them before that committee, and for sixty long days, earnestly, carefully, faithfully, fairly, and patiently, we listened to the accusations and the testimony that he chose to bring forward against General Howard.

In replying to the accusations and the testimony that were offered against him General Howard occupied but three days. In that brief period of time we heard his testimony. We allowed, also, the counsel whom his accuser produced there to argue the case; we heard the argument upon the other side; and after full and faithful consideration we came to the conclusion that General Howard was not guilty of the charges that were preferred against him. Eight out of ten of that committee decided that the charges made had entirely failed, and they authorized me to lay before the House this resolution, which, by a vote of the House of 134 yeas to 52 nays, was adopted. I ask the Clerk to read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

March 2, 1871, Mr. TOWNSEND moved to suspend the rules and pass the following resolution of the Committee on Education and Labor, namely:

Resolved, That the policy pursued by the United States toward four and a half millions of its people suddenly enfranchised by the events of a great civil war, in seeking to provide for their education, to render them independent and self-supporting, and in extending to them civil and political equality, is a source of just national pride; and that the House hereby acquits Major-General Oliver O. Howard of the groundless and causeless charges lately preferred against him, and does hereby declare and record its judgment that, in successfully organizing and administering with fidelity, integrity, and ability, the Freedmen's Bureau, which has contributed so much to the accomplishment of the first two of these great ends, he is deserving of the gratitude of the American people.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have called for the reading of that resolution to show that in the estimation of a committee of this House the charges that were then made by the gentleman from New York were "groundless and causeless," and that General Howard was entirely acquitted from them, and to redeem the committee from the accusation that seems to have been made by the gentleman from New York, whether intentionally or not, of having endeavored to screen General Howard, or of having acted unfaithfully toward the House in making the investigation. They made it, as I said before, patiently and carefully and thoroughly, and arrived at the results which are contained in the resolution; and the House, after having all the testimony before it for twenty days or more, came to the conclusions that are embodied in that resolution, and passed it by the vote I have already stated.

Having vindicated the committee from what I considered the unfounded charges of the gentleman from New York, I give back the floor to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WOOD. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to yield me five minutes.

Mr. COBURN. I have agreed to yield just now to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ALBRIGHT.]

Mr. ALBRIGHT. When in the early part of this session the communication from the Secretary of War and the accompanying documents were presented to the House, I believed it was proper and right for the Committee on Military Affairs to investigate this matter. I believe now it would be better to have the Committee on Military Affairs do this, because they have all the power that a court of inquiry could have, and more too; because whatever findings they arrive at can be accompanied with such recommendations to Congress as may be deemed proper to legislate upon. Now, a military court of inquiry can do nothing of the sort. It has no power beyond its findings, and its findings must be simply in the form of recommendations. But since the committee has determined that this matter shall be referred to a court of inquiry, I do not feel disposed to resist it. I do not, however, see any objection to what is proposed by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] because, by the Articles of War, there is special provision made for courts-martial, and also for courts of inquiry, and the law which is applicable to one is not applicable to the other. The manner in which courts-martial are organized and constituted differs from that in which courts of inquiry are constituted under the law which prevails. A court of inquiry must be organized and provided for by the President of the United States, if he sees proper, or when demanded by the accused. A military officer, ordinarily, cannot organize a court of inquiry; it must be done by the President, or upon the demand of the accused. Now, in all trials where a man is accused of a crime he has a right to challenge. This is really not such a case as comes properly before a military tribunal, and it requires special legislation to bring it there. It is true, in my judgment, as has been remarked by other gentlemen who have addressed the House, that the men who might be named by the President to constitute this court might be men who would be prejudiced against General Howard, and yet the President not know that fact. It must be observed, however, that the challenge of General Howard would not be conclusive; because, while he may challenge, he must challenge for cause, and the sufficiency of that cause must be determined by the court itself. I refer gentlemen to the seventy-first Article of War, which relates to this subject, and is in these words:

When a member shall be challenged by a prisoner, he must state his cause of challenge, of which the court shall, after due deliberation, determine the relevancy or validity, and decide accordingly; and no challenge to more than one member at a time shall be received by the court.

Now that is the law which relates to courts-martial, and it is the law which it is proposed to make effectual for this court of inquiry. What objection can there be to it? It is said that it will be an imputation on the President. I cannot see in what sense it will be a reflection on him, because it is simply a provision designed to protect the rights of a man who is presumed to be innocent until he is found guilty by the tribunal that is to try him.

Now, sir, like the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] I do not feel that this is the time or place to express our laudations of General Howard, or to say how much we admire him for having fought for his country, and for what he has done more recently. The question is whether General Howard is guilty of these charges and accusations. And there is this other question, what court or tribunal shall try him? I say, therefore, that I am in favor of having General Howard tried by a military court of inquiry, with the right to challenge any of his triers for cause.

Mr. COBURN. I now yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. YOUNG.]

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. There is nothing in this amendment, except that it is an imputation upon the President and the Army. No court of inquiry in the world ever denied the right of an accused to challenge one of its members. I have served upon many of them. A court of inquiry is the highest tribunal known to military jurisprudence. It has power far beyond that of a court-martial, excepting to prescribe punishment; it has power that a court-martial does not possess, in procuring testimony, and there is no court of inquiry, no military authority which ever denied any accused before it the right to challenge one of its members. In order to prove this I have, since the beginning of this discussion, sent a dispatch to the War Department, and have received the answer, which I send to the Clerk's desk, and desire to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 30, 1874.

Hon. P. M. B. YOUNG, House of Representatives:

Secretary at Cabinet. It is held by all the authorities to be an established principle that the accused has the right to challenge members in a court of inquiry.

H. T. CROSBY, Chief Clerk,
(For Secretary.)

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. With pleasure.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. What harm is there in putting this in and making it certain?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. What harm would there be in putting in an amendment that would require the President to appoint an impartial court?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not think it would do any harm.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I think it would do considerable harm; it would be a reflection on the Chief Magistrate of the nation. The right of challenge in a court of inquiry has always, I repeat, been regarded as the prerogative of the accused. Courts of inquiry do not partake of the prosecuting features of courts-martial. They have even been regarded as a means of defense against unjust accusation from parties who are prejudiced. None of the functions of courts of inquiry are in the interests of the prosecution, but all of them are on the side of injured innocence; and hence I say it is absurd to hold that the accused can in any way be deprived of his undeniable right to challenge any member of a court of inquiry; in fact I am sure no officer of the Army would serve upon a court of inquiry when the accused objected to him, no matter whether the objection was held valid or not by the court.

Mr. SHANKS. I will ask the gentleman whether a civil court feels itself reflected on by the criminal at the bar challenging one of the jury?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I consider the cases very different. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to, because it is not necessary. I am sure that a court of inquiry would no more feel itself reflected upon, in the case of a challenge of one of its members, than would a civil court under like circumstances, for I shall always hold and maintain that the accused has the same right to challenge a member of a court of inquiry that he has to challenge a member of a court-martial, or one of the jurors in a civil court. Therefore I see no reason to ingraft this amendment on the resolution of the committee, which it appears to me must be looked upon as an imputation upon the President and the Army.

Mr. SHANKS. This is in the nature of a grand jury.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. It goes far beyond a grand jury. I repeat that I hope the amendment will not be agreed to, because I assure every member of the House that no court of inquiry will ever deny to any accused the right to challenge one of its members.

Mr. COBURN. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER.]

Mr. SPEER. This surely is not the time to judge or prejudge General Howard. I make no assumption of his guilt. I give him the benefit which every accused party is entitled to, of the presumption of innocence until he is legally proved guilty. But whether innocent or guilty, it is certainly in bad taste, and injurious to General Howard himself, at this stage to have the accusations against him met, not with evidence of his innocence but with the wildest rhapsodies over the achievements of his past life. It is an old and familiar trick with criminal pleaders, when they have no other defense to make, to throw the good character of their clients into the jury-box. I admit that character is a fact to be considered; that when General Howard shall be put upon his trial, if that day shall ever arrive, his character, his services to the country, faithful and meritorious as they have been, may all be proper subjects for the consideration of the court which shall try him. But what have we to do here at this hour and at this stage of the proceedings with those things? What have the star-spangled banner, the battle-fields of the South, the regiments marching and filing and counterfiling through the city of New York, with their flags tattered and torn borne at their head—what have all these to do with this question, except to afford gentlemen an opportunity of indulging in fine specimens of spread-eagle oratory? All these surely can do no good to General Howard. They seem to be resorted to to divert the attention of the country from the charges made and to darken the air with the dust of fulsome and hollow flattery.

Now, what should General Howard ask? He should ask that to which he is entitled. First, a fair court of inquiry; and, secondly, and above all things, he should demand a thorough investigation. He, above all others, should desire a fair court and a thorough investigation; because the result of the work of any other court will do and can do him no good. If this thing is to be a whitewashing process, to bespatter him with eulogies of his past services, instead of being an honest, fair, impartial, thorough, and incisive investigation into the facts of the accusations made, then it would be better for him and his reputation that it never be made at all.

If General Howard is innocent he should be the man asking for a court of inquiry. He should not have waited until the Secretary of War presented to this House accusations and charges against him. He should have come here himself, or he should have gone to the President, and asked for the means of vindicating his character and reputation before the country and the world.

Now a word upon the subject of challenge. I want this investigation to be fully and thoroughly made. But it seems to be a little singular and exceptional to put in a provision here that has never been accorded to any other party accused under similar circumstances, allowing the accused to challenge and allowing the parties challenged to determine upon the sufficiency of the challenge. I submitted an amendment which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] would not allow to be considered as pending, to the effect that the President should judge of the sufficiency of the challenge upon reasons publicly assigned by the accused. That would put upon the accused the responsibility of assigning reasons that would stand the test of public scrutiny; and it would throw upon the President the responsibility of meeting those reasons, and of determining their sufficiency under the obligations of his high office.

No honorable officer would sit in a court if the accused should challenge him, whether the cause for challenge were sufficient or insufficient. No honorable soldier would sit upon an investigation like this with his usefulness destroyed before the investigation commenced. Because, if he were challenged for cause and were still to remain, even though the cause should be of the most frivolous character, the weight of his judgment and opinion would be destroyed by the charge that he was prejudiced.

I understand that the universal practice in cases like this is to allow challenges for cause; and I know of no reason for making an exceptional and special provision in favor of General Howard. If the uniform rule is to be departed from in his case, then I submit that it would be proper to provide that the Secretary of War, having preferred the charges, should also have the right to challenge for cause, on the part of the Government. If it is deemed proper to protect the accused from an inquiry possibly conducted by an unfriendly court, it seems equally fair that the Government should have the power of securing an honest investigation, by keeping off the court the special friends of General Howard. The danger is, not that the President will convene a court composed of his enemies, but of his friends. And as the court, when convened, can only inquire and report, and not convict, this early movement of the friends of the accused seems to show that he flutters even before he is shot.

Mr. COBURN. I now yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] for three minutes.

Mr. WOOD. I would not again have troubled the House upon this question but for the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TOWNSEND.] I stated before, and I now repeat, that witnesses were summoned to the door of that committee-room to investigate the charges against General Howard, that they were denied admission, and the committee refused to entertain for a moment a request that they be brought into the committee-room to give testimony implicating General Howard. I read now from page 48 of the report of the minority of the committee in that case, Report No. 122 of the Forty-first Congress, second session:

> It was offered to be proved that in South Carolina the assistant commissioner, Scott, had been elected governor of that State by the corrupt use of rations, provisions, and transportations; that as an officer of the Bureau, and having the control of this property, he, by and with the knowledge and connivance of Howard, did use such property to the extent of $300,000 for this purpose. The names of the witnesses, men of high character and members of the republican party, were handed to the committee and subpœnas asked for them, by whom, it was stated by respectable persons, these facts could be substantiated. The majority of the committee refused to allow them to be summoned.

Now, I say the less the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] says in behalf of his committee the better, because the subsequent action of the Secretary of War, who cannot be suspected of any personal or partisan hostility to General Howard, has, in the course he has taken in presenting the accusation here, fully censured that committee, and has shown that it was a whitewashing committee all through. Now, the final resolution which the minority of the committee reported to this House was very much like the proceeding we are now taking. The minority of the committee asked the House to adopt this resolution:

> Resolved, That a copy of the testimony taken by the Committee on Education and Labor, in the investigation of the charges made by Hon. FERNANDO WOOD, of New York, against Major-General Oliver O. Howard, be referred to the Secretary of War, with directions to order a court-martial for the trial of said Howard upon the charges so made.

And every member of the republican party in this House at that time voted against the adoption of that resolution. If I had time within my three minutes to tell to this House the conduct of that committee, I think that no member of the committee would afterward dare to rise in his place here and attempt to vindicate its action.

Mr. COBURN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR.]

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, the accusations which have been made by the Secretary of War against General Howard do not, so far as I understand them, relate to any of the matters which were investigated by a committee of this House in a former Congress.

Mr. WOOD. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The matter in question here was embraced in those specifications.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I repeat my general statement, that the specifications made before that committee did not cover the same charges as are now made by the Secretary of War. But in order to show the character and spirit of the person who has made these charges against General Howard and against the committee of which I was a member in the last Congress but one, I will simply state the fact, which has been so strangely perverted and misstated in the speech of the gentleman from New York. That committee gave to the accuser, who was represented by able counsel, sixty days in which to prosecute this investigation. At the end of that time the counsel whom he had employed (a gentleman who I will say conducted himself with great propriety before the committee) was accused of a contempt of court in this District, and to escape the process of the court fled into a neighboring State. An application was made to the committee to delay their investigation in consequence of the absence of the counsel under those circumstances. Wishing to be perfectly fair, although we considered the fact presented no sufficient cause for delay, we asked at what time the investigation would be concluded provided the delay sought for were granted. The time was fixed by the accuser himself, within which he bound himself to conclude his testimony if we would grant delay in consequence of the absence of his counsel. When that time arrived, we had reached so late a period in the session that we could give General Howard only three days to answer this evidence that had extended over sixty days. After the expiration of that time, which had been fixed with the consent of the accuser, in view of the indulgence granted him by the committee, he came in with an offer of further evidence relating to a transaction in South Carolina, the investigation of which would necessarily have involved sending the whole investigation over to another session of Congress. We refused permission to go into this additional charge and to hear these new witnesses.

Now, Mr. Speaker, General Howard never pleaded a statute of limitations in his life in answer to any charge. I ask the House to mark the unfairness with which it is now sought to deal with the character of a brave officer, who has lost his right arm in the service of his country, and with the character of the associates on this floor of the gentleman from New York. I am willing to risk whatever reputation I have anywhere as a lawyer or as a public man, not on the correctness of the conclusions which in this or any other case I may have reached, but on the fairness, and thoroughness, and impartiality with which we heard the charges of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. COBURN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Speaker, has not the hour of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] expired?

The SPEAKER. It is just about expiring.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. WHEELER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COBURN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COBURN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX. If I may be allowed, I will yield to my colleague, [Mr. WOOD.]

Mr. WOOD. In reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. G. F. HOAR,] I desire to say that he is now, as he was then, the friend, the counsel, the adviser, the defender, and the small legal trickster, engineering the case of General Howard.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call the gentleman from New York to order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the language used by the gentleman is not proper.

Mr. WOOD. Well, I will withdraw the word "trickster."

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman having been called to order, cannot proceed without the consent of the House.

Mr. WOOD. I want to explain the action of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has called the gentleman from New York to order; and it is not within the power of the Chair to allow him to proceed except by leave of the House.

Mr. WOOD. Then, if I understand the Speaker correctly, I must get the consent of the House before I can proceed.

The SPEAKER. That is the rule.

Several MEMBERS. No objection.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the gentleman be allowed to proceed in order, not withdrawing anything he has said.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the gentleman from New York be allowed to proceed in order.

Mr. WHEELER. I rise to a point of order. Has not the hour to which the gentleman from Indiana was entitled expired?

The SPEAKER. It is expiring just this moment.

Mr. WHEELER. Then I call for the regular order.

Mr. WOOD. I hope my colleague [Mr. WHEELER] will not interpose in this way.

Mr. WHEELER. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The hour allowed for debate after the ordering of the main question has expired; and the question will now be taken first upon the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the resolution reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Add to the resolution the following:

Provided, That the accused may be allowed the same right of challenge as is allowed by law in trials by court-martial.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were—ayes 87, noes not counted.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MILLS. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] proposes to add the following proviso to the resolution reported by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the accused may be allowed the same right of challenge as is allowed by law in trials by court-martial.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 172, nays 64, not voting 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Albert, Albright, Arthur, Atkins, Barnum, Barrere, Bass, Biery, Bradley, Bromberg, Buffinton, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Benjamin F. Butler, Roderick R. Wilson—52.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. KASSON. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to a verbal correction necessary in the ninth line, where the words occur "contained in the communication of the Secretary of War to the Speaker of this House." This being a proposed enactment of Congress, instead of "this House," it should be, "the House of Representatives."

Mr. COBURN. That correction is proper.

The SPEAKER. The verbal correction by the gentleman from Iowa will be made.

The joint resolution was then passed.

Mr. COBURN moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, to resume the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I rose at the same time as the gentleman from New York, desiring to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. And I submit that as a question of order my motion takes precedence.

Mr. NEGLEY. I desire the gentleman having the floor to yield to me to have a bill printed and recommitted.

Mr. WHEELER. I decline to yield.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would be glad to be permitted to submit a resolution, merely for reference to the Printing Committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks the attention of the House to what the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union may be entertained on private-bill day; but a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House takes precedence, unless, according to the general, though not universal, practice a special order is pending in the former.

The SPEAKER. The rulings have been both ways in regard to which motion should take precedence. But the Chair thinks, in view of the adoption of the recent rule, by which all bills of a private nature containing any appropriation of property or money should go to Committee of the Whole, cutting them off from the opportunity of being at once passed by the House, that it is the fair ruling to give the precedence on Friday to the motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. But it can make no possible difference, because neither motion is debatable, and if one is negatived the other immediately comes up.

The question being taken on the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, there were—ayes 93, noes 52.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The House is in the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. CESSNA, will please take the chair.

Mr. RANDALL. Before the House goes into the Committee of the Whole, I move that the session of to-morrow be devoted to debate only.

Objection was made.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I move that when the House adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's motion would not be in order, because the House is really in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not see that the chairman of the Committee of the Whole is in the chair. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The motion, nevertheless, has been adopted. But before the Speaker leaves the chair he will, if there is no objection, refer a resolution submitted by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD,] for the printing of three thousand extra copies of the bill reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency. The resolution goes, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CESSNA in the chair,) and proceeded to consider the business on the Private Calendar.

APPROACHES TO THE HOUSE.

The first business on the Calendar was the following resolution from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, by Mr. PLATT, of Virginia:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, That the architect of the Capitol extension be authorized and directed to employ a man, at a salary of not exceeding sixty dollars per month, for the purpose of keeping the approaches to the House in good order during the session of Congress.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I understand that the Doorkeeper has detailed a portion of his force for this work. I move, therefore, that the resolution be laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it be not adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would inquire of the Chairman if this is objection day under the rules or not?

The CHAIRMAN. The Speaker of the House informs the Chair that this is not objection day. The Clerk will read the rule upon the subject.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

129. On the first and fourth Friday and Saturday of each month the Calendar of Private Bills shall be called over, (the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House commencing the call where he left off the previous day,) and the bills to the passage of which no objection shall then be made shall be first considered and disposed of. But when a bill is again reached, after having been once objected to, the committee shall consider and dispose of the same, unless it shall again be objected to by at least five members.

The CHAIRMAN. This being the fifth Friday of the month, the rule does not apply.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is the pending motion in reference to the resolution?

The CHAIRMAN. That it be reported to the House adversely.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that motion will be concurred in.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont, and it was agreed to.

WILLIAM H. VESEY.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1400) for the relief of William H. Vesey.

Mr. SPEER. I think the Clerk has missed one bill—the bill (H. R. No. 604) for the relief of Robert N. McMillan, late collector of customs and superintendent of lights for the district of Teche, in the State of Louisiana.

Mr. BLAINE, (the Speaker.) I desire to state to the committee that that bill is on the Calendar by mistake. A bill for the relief of Robert N. McMillan was reported from two committees; being reported by one of the committees it passed, and being reported by another it was placed on the Calendar. It should be laid aside.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. It was reported by the Committee on Claims and passed.

The bill was laid aside.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the pending bill.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to William H. Vesey, former consul of the United States at Havre, in France, the sum of $1,320.57, being the amount of his loss in consequence of the failure, on March 27, 1857, of the house of Green & Co., American bankers, with whom he had deposited moneys belonging to the United States to the amount of $1,467.30, upon the assignment by said Vesey to the United States of his claim against said firm for the moneys so deposited.

Mr. SPEER. Is there a report in that case?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that there is no report.

Mr. COX. I will state that I reported this bill from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. There is a report made to the Senate by Mr. PRATT, of Indiana, last year, and the case was also favorably reported on by Mr. SUMNER, of Massachusetts, three years ago. I did not think it worth while to write out a new report, as in a letter from the State Department, dated January 13, 1874, they sent me Mr. PRATT'S report. The facts are stated there and are verified by one of the Auditors of the Treasury. This Mr. Vesey had $1,400 of Government money. He placed it in Green & Co.'s bank. They became insolvent, and, unlike many bankers, they paid 10 per cent. as dividend. One hundred and forty-odd dollars were paid to this consul; $1,320 were paid by our consul into the Treasury, closing up his accounts. The truth is that he placed this money in that bank as the safest depository in Havre. Minister Washburne writes that he could not have made it safer by keeping it in his own office. He lost the money by the failure of the bank. It is a case exactly like that of the postmaster for whose relief a bill was reported the other day by some gentleman from Massachusetts. The Committee on Foreign Affairs were unanimous in following the report of Senator PRATT and of Senator SUMNER, and concluded that this man ought to be reimbursed for a loss occasioned by the failure of a bank.

Mr. TOWNSEND. How much was it?

Mr. COX. A little over $1,300. I ask the Clerk to read the report of Mr. PRATT.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of William H. Vesey, praying to be relieved of a certain loss sustained while consul at Havre, France, submit the following report:

Mr. Vesey presents the following state of facts as the basis for the relief asked: On the 27th of March, 1857, he was consul of the United States at Havre, and had been for several years previously. During all this time he had been in the habit of depositing moneys received by him in his official capacity with the banking-house of Green & Co., American bankers at Paris, with a branch at Havre, for safe-keeping. On that day there remained on deposit in the hands of said firm the sum of $1,467.30 at the time they failed and became insolvent. On settlement of their affairs Mr. Vesey has received 10 per cent. of his deposit, or $146.73, leaving a loss of $1,320.57. Notwithstanding the failure, Mr. Vesey paid the amount of his deposit into the Treasury of the United States.

He asks Congress to refund him the sum of $1,320.57, and says he has executed an assignment to the United States of all his right, title, interest, and claim to the moneys still due from Green & Co.

The present minister to France recommends the relief of Mr. Vesey.

The Secretary of the Treasury makes no recommendation, but admits that Mr. Vesey has paid the amount of the loss into the Treasury.

The chief clerk in the State Department pays a high compliment to Mr. Vesey as a faithful officer, and says that full confidence may be placed in his statements.

The Secretary of State expresses his confidence in Mr. Vesey's account of his loss, and says this gentleman was for many years in the employ of the Government under his Department in several consulates, and enjoyed a high reputation for integrity, capacity, and the faithful discharge of all the duties of his position.

That the money was lost by the failure of the bankers; that it was funds belonging to the United States, though standing to the credit of Mr. Vesey; that it has been made good to the United States, are facts which the committee assume as established. The evidence is not before us showing the standing and reputed solvency of Green & Co. at the time of failure, though from the report made to this body on May 23, 1860, by the Committee on Foreign Relations, it would seem there was satisfactory evidence before them that up to the date of their suspending payment the credit of Green & Co. was good, and their branch house at Havre regarded a safe place for the deposit of moneys, better much than the keeping of them by Mr. Vesey either at the consulate or at his residence. Such is the testimony of Mr. Mason, at that time minister from this country to France.

We think the evidence shows that the consul was not guilty of want of caution in making his deposits with this banking-house, if he chose to commit public funds to the hands of others at all for safe-keeping.

The deposit, however, was at his risk. He was bound to account for all the consular fees collected, and he confessed his liability at law by promptly accounting for the money.

Shall he or the Government be the loser? The committee are of opinion that Mr. Vesey should be relieved, and accordingly report a bill herewith, and recommend its passage.

Mr. COX. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee rose informally, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the resolution of the House, directing the Congressional Printer to furnish to each Senator, Member of the House of Representatives, and Delegate twenty-four copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

The Committee of the Whole then resumed its session.

PENELOPE T. HEALD.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1401) granting a pension to Penelope T. Heald.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mrs. Penelope T. Heald, widow of Henry H. Heald, captain of schooner Norman, and pay her a pension the same as if he was a master in the United States Navy, from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. SPEER. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Penelope T. Heald, for a pension, have considered the same, and submit the following report:

Penelope T. Heald, applicant, is the widow of Henry H. Heald, who was captain of schooner Norman, which was in the employ of Government as transport, and while master of such vessel it was captured by the rebels on the coast of Florida, burned, and the crew taken prisoners. While a prisoner, the captain died of starvation and disease, as is alleged. Did not belong to the military or naval service. Widow asks pension same as if her husband had been mustered into the service as master in the Navy; and the committee, considering the fact that the immediate voyage which resulted in the capture of the vessel was undertaken by orders from the commander of the military; that the Government have considered themselves responsible, and have paid for the vessel; and that said Heald was considered a prisoner of war, are inclined to the opinion that he rendered such service to his country as would entitle his widow, now in need, to a pension. They therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. BUFFINTON. This Captain Heald was a resident of my own city, and I would like to have the memorial in this case read. I can state from my own knowledge that I know the facts as stated in the memorial to be true.

Mr. RUSK. I hardly think that is necessary.

Mr. BUFFINTON. There is not the least question but what this captain was taken and held as prisoner of war, and died while so held.

Mr. SPEER. I desire to make an inquiry. Was the person to whose widow this bill proposes to grant a pension in the employ of the Government or in the employ of a private party?

Mr. BUFFINTON. He was in the employ of the Government. He was captain of the schooner Norman. The Government of the United States has paid the owners of the schooner for the loss of the schooner; that I know of my own knowledge.

Mr. SPEER. Was the schooner at the time under the control of the Government?

Mr. BUFFINTON. It was.

Mr. RUSK. The schooner was taken by order of the commanding general to transport rations from one point to another. While transporting those rations the schooner was captured and destroyed, the captain and crew were made prisoners, and the captain died while in prison. It was the strongest muster into the service that could be made; a muster by special order, forcing the man into the service, and depriving him of his free will in the matter.

Mr. SPEER. Has application been made to the Pension Department for a pension?

Mr. RUSK. Application has been made, but under the general law the name cannot be put on the pension-rolls. This captain was not mustered regularly, as it is termed; but he was put into the service by order of the commanding general, and not by regular enlistment and muster.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill, I believe, is without a precedent. I do not mean that there is no precedent for such a bill being brought into the House, because during the last four or five years there have been many such bills introduced. But I mean that the House has not heretofore passed any such bill as this, to give a pension to a civilian. The only question is, whether the House should now enter upon that policy? The policy heretofore has been to grant pensions only to persons engaged in the military or naval service of the United States. I believe I understand the history of this case. The vessel was chartered by the Government as a transport.

Mr. RUSK. It was not chartered by the Government. It was seized by the Government and pressed into the service.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope that portion of the evidence from the Military Department will be read, showing the seizure of this vessel and its application to military purposes, because it would be a very extraordinary case, especially in that branch of the service.

Mr. RUSK. I state for the benefit of the gentleman from Indiana that there have been several pensions granted to persons not mustered into the service of the United States. It has been the custom of this House to place upon the pension-rolls the widows of pilots of Government vessels who were not mustered into service, but were employed as pilots.

Mr. HOLMAN. But this was not a Government vessel. Precedents are always set by just these extreme cases, where our sympathies are excited.

Mr. RUSK. The Government paid for the vessel.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly; the Government pays for every vessel that is chartered or pressed into the service and lost; that is all that was done in this case. Whether this vessel was chartered or pressed into the service, the persons on the vessel, the captain of the vessel and the crew, were not in military service and bound to remain there.

Mr. RUSK. How can the gentleman get a man into the service any stronger than by force?

Mr. HOLMAN. The report does not say that he was put there by force.

Mr. RUSK. Just read that report, if you please.

Mr. BUFFINTON. The captain of this vessel protested against making this trip which he was ordered to make by the commanding officer. He protested in as strong terms as it was possible for him to use. He was compelled to make it; was taken prisoner with all his crew; and but one of the crew and officers came out of prison alive.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Was he held as prisoner of war?

Mr. BUFFINTON. He was, and so acknowledged.

Mr. HOLMAN. That was the case with many civilians in all portions of the country. If they were taken within the rebel lines they were held as prisoners of war by the rebel authorities until properly exchanged. But the point of objection is to the fact that we propose to grant a pension to a person who was not in any sense in the military or naval service. I think the Government should go to the extreme of granting pensions to all men, or their widows, who were actually in the military service. That is necessary for the purpose of obtaining enlistments in the Army. If a soldier is satisfied that, should he be disabled or should he die and leave a widow and children, the Government will make provision for them to the extent that can be accomplished by a pension, there will be that inducement for men to enter the service. There seems to be nothing here to repel the assumption that this captain of this vessel was acting ordinarily as other captains acted.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The gentleman from Indiana has inquired whether application has been made to the Pension Office for a pension in this case. I will ask him the further question if it is not true that every case that comes here for a pension is a case that has been rejected at the Pension Office because it does not come under the general pension law, and therefore requires a special act?

Mr. HOLMAN. O, yes.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Is it not true that a large number of the pension bills passed here are to cover cases in which persons have rendered undoubted service as soldiers, sailors, or marines, but for some reason or other were not regularly mustered in? Here is a case, as I understand, where the man, being under the absolute control of military authority, was forced into the service, was taken prisoner, and died in prison. I understand those to be the facts.

Mr. BUFFINTON. There is no question about that.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not understand that this man was forced into the service. I ask that the report may be read again.

The report was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is very clear from that report that this was a chartered vessel; and it is proposed that the captain of this vessel shall receive a pension. This is going very much further than the House has ever gone before. I am willing to join in doing justice in that vast multitude of cases where actual military service has been rendered, but where the claims have been rejected at the Pension Office upon merely technical grounds. Yet I must object to the precedent which favorable action upon this case would establish; for I must insist that this is the first instance in which a civilian, a captain or employé upon a chartered vessel in the service of the Government, has been regarded as in the military service so as to entitle him to a pension. On the contrary, I regard this as manifestly the beginning of a civil pension list.

I know of no duty that is more clearly incumbent upon the Government than that of providing a liberal system of pensions with reference to persons who actually render service in the Army or the Navy. The establishment of such a system is to be advocated not merely as a matter of sympathy or humanity, but on the ground of the public interest; so that persons in the military and naval service of the Government may feel that, in case of casualty, they or their widows and children shall not be left without any provision for their support. But, in the case now before us, the motive for a pension is entirely absent. Here was the captain of a chartered vessel——

Mr. RUSK. Will the gentleman permit me to make an explanation?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. RUSK. This vessel was chartered to transport horses from New York to New Orleans, and after discharging that cargo was impressed into the service to carry rations from New Orleans to another point.

Mr. HOLMAN. That does not appear in the report.

Mr. RUSK. I examined the case and made the report; and the statement I now make as chairman of the committee is as good as the statement embraced in the report.

Mr. HOLMAN. I admit that fully.

Mr. RUSK. I will state further that I submitted this matter to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and he told me he would not object.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. If the whole report were read, it would show——

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I have the floor now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts in a few minutes. I always like to hear him speak.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, who has the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUFFINTON] took the floor some time ago. How long a time did he yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN?]

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to yield the floor to me. I asked and obtained the floor in my own right.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The five-minute rule, I believe, prevails.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has been much more than five minutes on the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts with great pleasure. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I only desire to say——

Mr. DAWES. I would like to understand why the five-minute rule obtains.

Mr. RANDALL. There is no five-minute rule operating now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is correct.

Mr. DAWES. So I supposed.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the reason the Chair asked the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUFFINTON] how long he yielded to the gentleman from Indiana. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has the floor now.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to say that this report, when fully read, answers all the objections of the gentleman from Indiana. It states that—

> The immediate voyage which resulted in the capture of the vessel was undertaken by orders from the military commander.

So that this man was brought directly under the orders of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. If this vessel was chartered would she not still be operating under an order? Is there anything to repel the assumption that the vessel was a chartered vessel?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. The vessel, whether chartered or not, was under the orders of the military commander. The captain and the crew had no choice; they must go where they were told to go. They were as much under the orders of the military commander as was any soldier. I want to say further, this House and Congress have set the precedent of giving relief in special cases where men were not mustered in. For example, the Sixth Massachusetts Regiment started from Massachusetts without being mustered into the service. They went through Baltimore. They could not be mustered in, for they were going to Washington to be mustered in. Six were killed in Baltimore in coming to Washington, and the country has taken their families under its charge. There are other cases where men were killed while going to muster. So the only question is, was the man potentially or legally in the service of the United States? If he is legally in by muster, he gets a pension without coming here. If he is only potentially in by order, then he has to come here to get it.

Mr. BUFFINTON. I hope the bill will now be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not understand what pension it is proposed to pay under this bill. This is not a private soldier in any sense. He was not a naval officer. I ask the bill be again reported.

The bill was again reported.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to know from the chairman of the committee exactly what is the pension of a master in the Navy.

Mr. RUSK. I believe it is thirty dollars, but he is only to be paid the pension as fixed by law for this grade.

Mr. HOLMAN. Thirty dollars is the highest pension known.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is it proposed to pay this man the highest pension?

Mr. RUSK. It is not.

Mr. KELLOGG. Then it is not proposed to pay more than thirty dollars if that be the highest pension?

Mr. RUSK. It is only proposed to pay him the pension allowed by law.

Mr. HOLMAN. We are acting blindly, for we are not able to tell what is the pension we propose to grant.

Mr. BUFFINTON. It is the pension under the law.

Mr. RUSK. I am told the pension in this case will be fifteen dollars. It does not make any difference what the man is. If he is entitled to that pension he ought to have it. This bill grants him a pension which under the law he is entitled to.

Mr. HOLMAN. He was not a captain in the service, although he was the captain of a chartered vessel. He was not an officer or a sailor in our service. That is clear enough. The fixing of this grade in this case is therefore purely arbitrary. And I wish only to add to what I have already said on this subject, that there seems to be a growing tendency, which ought not to be encouraged, to build up as it were in these cases a civil pension list. That tendency seems to be very strong. It displays itself at every session of Congress more or less. All that seems to be necessary is to get some extreme case, where our sympathies are strongly aroused, where the motive for legislation is strong, and in that way lay the foundation for building up a civil pension list. Pensions for those who have served in the Army and Navy ought to be encouraged, and, in my judgment, we cannot be too liberal to those who have been disabled, or to the families of those who have fallen in the service; but I do insist we ought not to begin the establishment of a list of civil pensions.

Mr. BUFFINTON. I move that the bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 83, noes 18.

So the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

EZRA TAYLOR.

The CHAIRMAN. The next thing on the Private Calender is an adverse report upon the petition of Ezra Taylor, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That Colonel Ezra Taylor, chief of artillery Fifteenth Army Corps, in 1863 and 1864, was honorably discharged from the service on the 20th day of July, 1864, on account of gunshot wounds received at the battle of Dallas, Georgia; that he made application for a pension on the 28th day of December, 1871, and that pension was granted him at the rate of thirty dollars per month, commencing on the 3d day of February, 1872, application not having been made within the five years' limitation. He asks that his pension shall commence on the date of his discharge from the service, and that he be paid the arrears due him. Your committee believe, from all the circumstances surrounding the case, that Colonel Taylor should be allowed the arrears of pension from date of discharge from the service to the 3d day of February, 1872, but, owing to an unjust provision in the pension laws, and the action of the House in similar worthy cases, are forced to report adversely.

Mr. HURLBUT. Mr. Chairman, I desire briefly to call the attention of the committee to this case.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I rise to a point of order—what question is there before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. An adverse report on the petition of Ezra Taylor.

Mr. HURLBUT. I propose to have the case recommitted to the committee. I move that it be laid aside to be reported back to the House for the purpose of being recommitted, with instructions to the committee to report back a bill for the relief of Ezra Taylor.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to the gentleman that he omit from his motion any instruction to the committee, for it does no good.

Mr. HURLBUT. I am not particular as to how the motion shall be stated. I ask for the reading of the petition.

The CHAIRMAN. There seems to be no petition, but there is a letter from Colonel Taylor, which will be read.

Mr. HURLBUT. The letter of Colonel Taylor embraces a statement of the facts.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHICAGO, November 17, 1873.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to inclose a copy of the bill for my relief, which failed to become a law, as I suppose, from want of time to get through the committee before the Forty-second Congress adjourned, and most respectfully to solicit your influence in my behalf in getting this or a similar bill passed at the coming session of Congress. There can be no doubt I am justly entitled to the relief asked, and that I am greatly in need of it the bill will, no doubt, convince you. I lost all by the fire, after which I overworked myself in my endeavor to provide a new home for myself and family, the result of which was that in December last I was taken sick and confined to the house all winter and spring and prevented from attending to my business, which is that of inspector of provisions.

About the 1st of August last got to work again for a few days; when the money panic came on and cut me off again, so that in the past year I have scarcely done anything. It being quite impossible to live on air, I have been compelled to borrow $5,000 in order to enable me to meet my obligations.

Mr. HURLBUT. I desire to state to the committee that Colonel Taylor entered the service as captain of Battery B early in 1861. He was at Donelson and Shiloh; was promoted colonel of the First Regiment Illinois Artillery, acted as chief of ordnance for General Sherman, and continued in the service with him until the 20th day of July, 1864, when he was honorably discharged the service on account of gunshot wounds received at the battle of Dallas, Georgia. He has a record as good as that of any of the most gallant officers that served in any portion of our Army.

Now, sir, this gentleman, being comparatively well to do in the world at the end of the war declined to become an applicant for a pension, and to be a burden upon the country; and he never made any application for a pension at all until in the great fire at Chicago his property was swept away. He then made his application for a pension, and it was allowed him at the rate of thirty dollars a month, to commence from the 3d day of February, 1872; and he asks now that his pension or the arrears of it be granted to him as if he had made his application when he was by law entitled to do it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] inform us whether this pension was granted in the regular course by the Pension Bureau or by act of Congress? I would infer from the letter which has been read that it was granted by act of Congress.

Mr. HURLBUT. I understand it was granted by an act passed last session.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is not the reason for the pension commencing from the date of its being granted to be found in the fact that this applicant did not file his petition within the five years' limit?

Mr. HURLBUT. The pension was granted to Colonel Taylor, not by special act of Congress—I was in error as to that—but in the regular course of business in the Pension Office, and could only commence from the date of the pension being granted, because he had allowed the lapse of time to run against him. Now I state to the House as a fact within my own personal knowledge, and I will be confirmed by two gentlemen from Chicago who are Representatives upon this floor, that the reasons why Colonel Taylor did not make application within the time that would have entitled him to draw the pension from the date of his disability are such as I have stated; that he had no call from pecuniary necessity at that time to become a burden on the country, and consequently did not choose to load it down by any demands of his own; but now that calamity has overtaken him he asks this Congress that the provision which your own committee designated as an unjust provision in the pension laws may not operate to defeat his receiving the arrears to which he is entitled on all principles of equity and of justice.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Illinois whether it would not be right, in view of this report from the committee, in which for my own part I concur, to provide by a general bill for an extension of pensions back to the date of the disabilities incurred in the service.

Mr. HURLBUT. To that I would have no objection; but I do not want to have the case of my friend overslaughed by a general act.

Mr. SPEER. Just such a bill as that was passed by the House last Congress, but failed in the Senate.

Mr. HURLBUT. I hope such a bill will be passed here again.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. This same question has been before Congress for several years at every session. Of course this is a meritorious case, In fact, in every case where a person is pensioned on account of injuries received in the service, the pension in justice, one would think, should date back to the time of the injury instead of dating from the application for the pension. But the policy which has been adopted by Congress, in law and in practice, has been to date the pensions granted by all these special acts from the passage of the act. And, besides, there is the general statute of limitation applying to all these cases that are not brought to the notice of the Pension Office within five years.

Now, whether this is wise or unwise as a matter of law, while it is a law it ought to be respected, and such a case as this ought not to be passed over the law. It is no more meritorious than hundreds of other cases. In fact, in most of these cases—and they come to the attention of members every day—when the application has not been made within five years it has been delayed for the very reason stated in this case of Colonel Taylor. The persons entitled to the pension were in easy circumstances, and they did not care about drawing bounties from the Government while they were abundantly able to support themselves. They therefore did not take advantage of the pension law. But, some disaster having overtaken them, their property having been swept away by fire or some other calamity, they come then and ask that they may have their pension. And whether it be wise or unwise to refuse to date back their pensions, the policy which Congress has adopted during the last four years has been to refuse to grant arrears. And I think there is some wisdom in that in one aspect of it. In the last Congress some gentlemen will remember that we had applications running back twenty, thirty, and forty years.

I was on the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812 in the last House, and application came before that committee to date pensions back to the time of the war of 1812, and was supported with much zeal. Special acts have been passed granting pensions to persons for disabilities occasioned by their service in the war of 1812, granted twenty, thirty, or forty years after that war. They came and asked for arrears of pension running back to the war of 1812. It has been thought, I know, by some gentlemen in the House that this delay in applying should be treated as a relinquishment, as an abandonment of the claim for pension; that the person had waived for the time being his claim, and that he should not be allowed to revive it at some later day. But, as I said at the outset, whether it is a wise or unwise provision of law, it seems to me the only way of getting over it is to repeal the law; and so I shall object very much to the passage of the bill in this particular case, although I am not at all certain that I should object to a repeal of the law, and the determination by law that all pensions of this kind may date back to the point of disability.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Chairman, I agree entirely with what has been said by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. WILLARD.] This bill belongs to what I conceive to be the most vicious class of legislation; special legislation for the benefit of particular persons in the nature of Government bounty, without any public reason. We have a law which prohibits soldiers from securing their pensions except from the time they apply for them. This law may be wise or it may be unwise, but it is a general law, and should be applied to all whom it affects equally. I regard nothing as more vicious in the nature of legislation than to listen to the cry of a man who comes here and says, "Make me an exception to the general law; give me the pension that you refuse to everybody else;" simply because he comes here and asks for it. We have such cases every week, not only in the form of applications for pensions, but of applications of every other kind for relief from the provisions of general laws. One man comes here and says, "Let me introduce a foreign-built ship, one not entitled to come in under the registry law, and give her a register." Another man comes here and says, "Let me bring in goods free, which I cannot get through the custom-house without paying duties upon them." Another man says, "Give me a pension which I am not entitled to under the general law." Now, I am one of those who believe trade should be free. I favor, with some limitations, free ships. I am opposed to duties of a protective nature, but I have nevertheless always resisted granting special privileges of such nature to anybody, because laws should be equal and just. The first duty of the Government is to see that its laws operate impartially on all its citizens.

Why, sir, I have sent me from my own district cases like that of the gentleman from Illinois; cases of men who were entitled to pensions long before they applied for them, but who delayed applying for them, because unwilling to add to the burdens of the country. Sir, such men are entitled to the gratitude of the country for their patriotism, and I greatly regret that it is not in the power of the Government to give them everything they may ask. It would indeed be a very gratifying thing if we could carry on the Government on the principle avowed by Tittlebat Titmouse when he first went to Parliament, of giving everybody everything; but inasmuch as somebody must bear the burdens of Government, and those burdens should be distributed equally, it is against the first principles of justice to discriminate in favor of persons, however meritorious, who are without any good reason for the discrimination except that they come here and importune the favor of the Congress to give them, at the expense of the whole people, what is denied to all others of the same class.

Mr. SPEER. The gentleman from New York is inaccurate in this, that there is a limitation by general law as to the time when a man may make application for a pension. The limitation is this, that if the application is not made within five years from the time of the death or the injury, then the pension shall date only from the date of the application or from the time of filing the proof. If a soldier had been injured thirteen years ago, at the beginning of the war, he could apply to-day for a pension—there is no limitation against his filing an application; but when the pension is allowed, it begins only from the date of the application, and does not run back to the date of the injury.

In the last Congress I introduced a bill to repeal that limitation, and provide that where an application for a pension is granted, the pension in all cases shall date back to the time of the death or of the injury. I think that is logical and just. If the pension is given for the injury, it should commence when the injury was incurred. That bill passed the House and went to the Senate, and was there defeated. It was stated in the House by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. GARFIELD] that that bill would take $20,000,000 from the national Treasury. If it would have taken $20,000,000 then, now, after the lapse of two years, it would take still more out of the Treasury. But the bill was based on an essential principle of justice; the principle is right and just, and if right and just it should apply to all cases. There is no justice in extending a just principle to a single case. It is using a just principle to inflict injustice; to deny to one soldier what you cannot to another.

Now, I will not oppose the bill of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT,] but I suggest that the true policy of this House is for all those gentlemen who agree with him to join hands here and pass a general bill, and then to go to the Senate with it, and induce the Senate to pass the bill. Then all cases will stand on an equal basis, and when pensions are granted they will date back to the time of the death or injury. But I submit that the policy is wrong of appealing to the generosity and sympathy of the Government to do a wrong; because, while it may grant to this soldier what is justly his, other soldiers, poorer perhaps than he, less able to support themselves and their families than he, are drawing pensions only from the date of their certificates. It would be giving to this soldier something like two or three thousand dollars of arrears of pensions; that is, thirty dollars a month for six or eight years. I say I will not vote against this bill, but I submit to the gentleman that the bill should be general, so as to embrace all.

Mr. HURLBUT. Such a bill is now pending before the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then let this bill be laid aside until the general bill is reported.

Mr. HURLBUT. My motion is that this bill be laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would ask if the Committee of the Whole has the power to report a subject back to the House with a recommendation that the subject be referred to the appropriate committee with instructions?

The CHAIRMAN. No doubt that motion might be made, but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] withdrew that portion of his motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, so as to add the recommendation to recommit this bill, with instructions to the committee to report a general bill extending pensions already granted back to the time of the death of the soldier.

Mr. RANDALL. What amount of money would that take out of the Treasury?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not know.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman is an economical member. He should consider that such a bill would take twenty millions out of the Treasury.

Mr. HOLMAN. When it is a question of justice to the men who served in our Army and Navy in times of the nation's peril, I have never sought to inquire the cost of doing justice, and I shall not now stop to inquire. When this House passed such a bill a few years ago, one that was conceded by all to be an act of mere common justice, the argument that it would be attended with great expense was not deemed to be a good one. I do not think such an argument is a good one now. It should not operate to the prejudice of the soldier that he delayed making application in this case. I suppose none of us have failed to receive applications from our constituents involving this same principle. I insist that, in whatever other respect we may economize, we should not attempt to economize at the expense of justice to the men who exposed their lives in our service. I never shall raise the cry of economy when a question like this is before the House, as I never have done.

Mr. RICE. I hold that the question of justice and liberality does not enter into the question that is now before the committee. I believe that every man in the United States desires through his Government to help those who sought to assist their country when in danger. Those who have been disabled in that service are entitled to assistance from this Government. But the Government of the United States has no more money now than it needs, and when those who served their Government and were disabled in that service have enough of this world's goods to make them independent of Government assistance, and do not apply for that assistance, I hold that by every principle of right the Government is debarred from assisting them in the days when they need no assistance. For that reason I believe the law as it stands is just and equitable to all the people, that from the day of their necessity, from the day when they shall ask for assistance, this Government shall grant it, and not before. I therefore move that the adverse report of the committee be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a motion pending to recommend that the bill be recommitted; and there is an amendment to that motion to recommit with instructions.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I rise to a point of order. Is it in order to amend any motion for commitment or recommitment of a private bill, by adding instructions to bring in a general law?

The CHAIRMAN. That point of order is raised too late. The amendment has been discussed for some time past.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. The motion to amend has just been made.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to amend was made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and he and other gentlemen have made speeches on it.

The question was then taken on the amendment; and it was not agreed to upon a division—ayes 46, noes not counted.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. HURLBUT to report the bill back to the House with a recommendation that it be recommitted.

Mr. POTTER. If I understand the question, it is simply whether we shall adopt the adverse report of the committee on this claim, or recommit it to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon non-concurring in the adverse report, and directing that the bill be reported back to the House with a recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 41, noes not counted.

So the motion of Mr. HURLBUT was not agreed to.

The question recurring on concurring in the adverse report of the committee, it was concurred in.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to; there being—ayes 90, noes not counted.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CESSNA reported that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar had had the same under consideration, and had directed him to report certain bills.

SESSION FOR DEBATE TO-MORROW.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask unanimous consent that the session of to-morrow be devoted to debate only.

Mr. COBURN. I would like to inquire whether the Committee on Appropriations do not wish to have a session to-morrow for business?

Mr. RANDALL. I think I can answer that they do not.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, it will be ordered that the session of to-morrow be for debate only, no business to be transacted.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

SECURITY OF LIFE ON STEAM-VESSELS.

Mr. NEGLEY, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Commerce a bill (H. R. No. 1588) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the better security of life on board of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1871; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed and recommitted, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

APPROACHES TO THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the consideration of bills, &c., reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. The first proposition is a resolution which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the architect of the United States Capitol extension be authorized and directed to employ a man, at a salary of not exceeding sixty dollars per month, for the purpose of keeping the approaches of the House in good order during the sessions of Congress.

The SPEAKER. This resolution is reported from the Committee of the Whole, with a recommendation that it be not adopted.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM H. VESEY.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1400) for the relief of William H. Vesey.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to William H. Vesey, former consul of the United States at Havre, in France, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,320.57, being the amount of his loss in consequence of the failure, on March 27, 1857, of the house of Green & Co., American bankers, with whom he had deposited moneys belonging to the United States to the amount of $1,467.30, upon the assignment by Vesey to the United States of his claim against the firm for the moneys so deposited.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENELOPE T. HEALD.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1401) granting a pension to Penelope T. Heald.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension-laws, the name of Mrs. Penelope T. Heald, widow of Henry H. Heald, captain of schooner Norman, and pay her a pension the same as if he was a master in the United States Navy, from and after the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. BUFFINTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EZRA TAYLOR.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the petition of Ezra Taylor.

The SPEAKER. This petition was reported upon adversely by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and was sent to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, whence it is now reported adversely. The question is, shall it lie on the table?

The petition was laid on the table.

DISTRIBUTION OF CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a privileged motion. I move to go to business on the Speaker's table, for the purpose of taking therefrom the resolution providing for the distribution of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which has been returned from the Senate with amendments, in which I shall ask the House to non-concur and appoint a committee of conference.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to make a statement of the effect of those amendments.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I wish you would.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Is this question of higher privilege than the motion to adjourn?

Mr. PENDLETON. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, to go to business on the Speaker's table, it was agreed to.

The first business on the Speaker's table was the following resolution, returned from the Senate with amendments:

Resolved, by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the Congressional Printer be instructed to furnish to each Senator, and to each Member and Delegate in the House of Representatives, twenty-four copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or of any such other like official reports of the debates in Congress as may be hereafter authorized by law, either daily as originally published, or in the revised form, without binding, or in bound volumes, or part in each form, as each Senator, Member, or Delegate may elect.

The SPEAKER. This comes back from the Senate amended thus:

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after "concurring," in line 2, down to and including "copies," in line 6, and insert the following: "That the Congressional Printer be directed to furnish thirty-one hundred copies for the use of the Senate, and seventy-two hundred and fifty for the use of the House of Representatives."

In line 12, after "each," where it occurs the second time, insert "Senator."

In line 13, after "Delegate," insert "receiving the same."

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, as I introduced the original resolution into the House, it may not be amiss for me to state the effect of these amendments of the Senate. The resolution as originally proposed, as will be seen by the reading, gave us twenty-four copies each, to the members of the Senate and the members of the House alike. The amendments of the Senate, lumping the number to the House and lumping the number to the Senate, give to the House twenty-three copies each, with a fraction of two hundred and fifty-four for extra requirements, and give to each member of the Senate forty-one copies, with sixty-six extra copies. I merely state the facts, and the House can now determine whether they wish to be on an equality with the Senate in this particular——

Mr. DAWES. Without regard to previous condition. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. Or whether they wish to give to the Senate more copies than they receive themselves.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to non-concur in the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. DONNAN. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. RANDALL. It has been to the Committee on Printing once already, so that the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts is in order.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary to go to the Committee on Printing at all. The gentleman from Massachusetts can call the previous question, as he holds the floor, having called up the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. That will cut off the motion to refer to the Committee on Printing.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments of the Senate were non-concurred in.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the House ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as managers of said conference on the part of the House, Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, Mr. RANDALL, and Mr. DONNAN.

HENRY SAVAGE.

Mr. E. R. HOAR, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1589) for the relief of Henry Savage, acting chargé d'affaires of the United States in Guatemala, from May 7, 1856, to November 14, 1858; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PROTECTION OF THE TEXAS FRONTIER.

Mr. GIDDINGS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1590) to provide for the better protection of the frontier of Texas against Indian and Mexican depredations; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed and recommitted, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

CAPTAIN BENJAMIN GREADELL.

Mr. COX. I wish to ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs a joint resolution (H. R. No. 45) tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain Benjamin Greadell, officers, and crew of the steamship Atlantic, of the White Star line, for saving the brigantine Scotland in mid-ocean.

I will state before the resolution is read that there was passed at the last session a resolution giving the thanks of Congress to the officers and crew of this vessel for saving another vessel belonging to Portland, Maine, in mid-ocean. A mistake, however, was made in the name of the captain. I ask the joint resolution may be passed in the House again, so it may go to the Senate, and proper thanks be tendered. The English government has given medals to the officers and crew, and I think the least we can do is to tender our thanks to the officers and crew of this vessel.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time.

It provides that the thanks of Congress be presented to Captain B. Greadell, and the officers and crew of the steamer Atlantic, of the White Star line, for saving the captain and crew of the brigantine Scotland, of Portland, Maine, wrecked in a tempestuous sea in mid-ocean.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES DE LONG.

Mr. MYERS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 526) for the relief of James De Long; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying papers, ordered to be printed.

SESSION OF SATURDAY.

Mr. PENDLETON. I insist upon my motion that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to adjourn the Chair will state that in pursuance of the order of the House the session of to-morrow will be for debate only, as in Committee of the Whole, no business whatever to be transacted. The gentleman from Missouri, Mr. PARKER, will be in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 31, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

On motion of Mr. KELLOGG, the reading of the Journal of yesterday was, by unanimous consent, dispensed with.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. PARKER, of Missouri, in the chair.) The House meets to-day, as in Committee of the Whole, for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] has the floor.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

ILLEGAL OVERISSUES—CURRENCY.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I am very much obliged to the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] for allowing me a few moments to explain a substitute I have offered for the bill relative to the currency reported by the Ways and Means Committee.

I made a remark the other day as to our "relapse into barbarism" on the money question, which tripped up my parliamentary heels very dromptly. I was not, strictly speaking, entitled to the floor at the time, so I do not complain; but I ought to explain, as the remark seemed to be a reflection on the civilization of which this House is a beautiful representative and exemplar. I meant only that our care for the present and carelessness of the future made us like those of the halcyon days of the remote and savage past. This remark was in reference to money. We are so happy in seeing no difference between printed notes and real money. It is all faërie currency to us.

On no subject which interests our society have we so much of that simple improvidence which belongs to the happy barbaric days. We are happy in summer and forget the winter ahead. During the first half of our hundred years of national existence there were prejudices existing in favor of gold and silver as a standard of values. The French assignats were too familiar to our ancestors. They were as familiar as the story of Paul and Virginia to our grandmothers. The South Sea bubble was to our early statesmen but a pretty prismatic inflation of soap and water—to collapse with the first zephyr; but these statesmen were stern and unpoetical Gradgrinds.

When I first came here, as chairman of Revolutionary Claims, continental money was sent us by the hatful, for redemption by special acts of Congress. But for them there was no redeemer. No one could tell the good from the bad, and two generations were made happy—the revolutionary one, which had used the paper, and the present one, which did not have to redeem it. It would be hard to say who suffered by this continental bubble. It would be unpleasant to inquire in a House so full of optimists as this.

In one of the essays of Macaulay it is proven that the youth of the world is most favorable to epic poetry. It is true that he revised this opinion afterward; but there are many writers who hold that the Arcadian simplicity which belongs to the untutored and uncivilized of our race is the happiest. Literature is full of illustrations of that bliss which is thought to accompany ignorance.

At no time since our beginning as a nation had we such beatitudes. We are really inside of Paradise. Desiring on behalf of the wise men of the East to present some facts, even though they militate against our present beautiful and roseate dreams of the fiscal Utopia, I have offered a bill, as a substitute for that of the Committee on Ways and Means.

When the debate opens on that bill I shall endeavor to represent the views of the best merchants and the interests of the workingmen of the city of New York. These views and interests are not those of speculators, but of the country.

This bill proposes to recall, without loss to the holders, the extra legal-tenders above three hundred and fifty-six millions.

The same arguments in favor of some law of this kind would be included in the general argument against the constitutional power of Congress, and against the expediency of increasing the volume of legal-tenders.

Congress must decide upon the legality of the Secretary's act. If his act is illegal, it is better at once to fix the status of the overissue, before the banks have expended their credits upon them, than to allow the banks to count them as legal-tenders, which are slowly to be withdrawn from circulation. To do this now might hurt a few speculators, but it is better to sacrifice them than hereafter the legitimate business of the whole country.

The passage of this act would take away only the legal attribute of money. The notes would continue to pass in circulation the same as the old demand notes, unless the convertible clause should make them worth a premium, until they had gradually all been either converted or paid into the Treasury. The Government has got to acknowledge the debt which they bear on their face, and it appears as if no plan could be better than the one suggested.

For one, I will not consent to overturn a fundamental principle of government to help a bankrupt Treasury; nor to abdicate the legislative duty to excuse an incompetent or defiant officer. He ought not to play with the issues and values of our material life. He should not be pardoned by legalizing acts. He has no more power than Congress, either by the first or second decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, to make such notes money; nor, under the Constitution, can such issues ever be made legal.

But, sir, I only propose to-day to throw down the glove in defense of these theses:

First. That our issues were limited to three hundred and fifty-six millions, and that all issues over that is a bold, bad, defiance of law.

Secondly. That by the last decision of the Supreme Court of the United States there is no power under the Constitution, in a time like this, when there is no great emergency of war, to issue such notes as money.

Thirdly. That such issues are not wise, even if constitutional.

When the question comes up for general debate on the bills reported by the Ways and Means and Banking and Currency Committees, I hope to express myself at length, and to offer the following substitute:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed to be submitted by Mr. COX to the bill (H. R. No. 1398) to fix the amount of legal-tender notes at $400,000,000.

Whereas The Secretary of the Treasury has caused to be issued United States notes to the sum of —— in excess of three hundred and fifty-six millions, the amount authorized by law, the same being in every respect like the legal-tender notes of the United States; and whereas the said notes were issued without authority of law, and are not legal-tenders; and whereas Congress cannot give them the attribute of money, inasmuch as Congress has not the constitutional power, under a recent decision of the Supreme Court, to make anything but gold and silver a legal tender, except in "seasons of great emergency," and as a last resort in defense of the Government; but whereas the said notes have been issued and paid to the public creditors, and are, therefore, a just debt against the Government of the United States: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a certain illegal issue of United States notes, amounting to the sum of —— dollars, issued between the — day of —— and the — day of ——, are a just debt against the United States, but are not legal-tenders, and are redeemable, at the pleasure of the Government, in legal money, or convertible, at the pleasure of the holders, into the United States bonds known as the new 5 per cents.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be prepared, immediately on the passage of this act, a full and complete list, designating the denomination and number of the overissue; and shall cause the same, with a copy of this act, to be delivered by mail or otherwise, to each and every national bank, and to be published in one newspaper in every city containing twenty thousand inhabitants in the United States: And provided, That it shall be the duty of every national bank, on receipt of the list and a copy of this law, to immediately stamp each note which they may then be possessed of, and thereafter every note which may be presented to them, which are included in the list furnished by the Secretary, as follows: "This note is not a legal tender:" And provided further, That the said notes shall be receivable by the Government for all dues, except duties on imports: And provided further, That when received into the Treasury they shall be canceled, and not reissued.

Mr. COBURN. Will the gentleman from New York answer me one question?

Mr. COX. I have not time.

Mr. COBURN. When the gentleman again addresses the House on this question I hope he will look at the point of law whether the contraction of the currency was not stopped at $356,000,000.

Mr. COX. I will make the most exhaustive discussion of the question I am capable of.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from New York read that part of the decision of the Supreme Court which he says decides that Congress, in times like these, cannot issue greenbacks as lawful money?

Mr. COX. I have not the book here. It is at my room.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] yield further?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I do not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] is entitled to the floor.

CENTRAL BRANCH UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I avail myself of the opportunity presented by the House being in Committee of the Whole for general debate to present some considerations in relation to the bill introduced by me to declare the true intent and meaning of the Union Pacific Railroad acts, so far as the same apply to what is now known as the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company.

My reason for doing this now is that it involves an analysis of statutes, the consideration of the action of Departments, and the arguments adduced in favor of the company, making a tedious and laborious investigation for which few members can find the necessary time from their other duties; and I hope by now presenting the questions involved to render it less difficult for my fellow-members to examine the subject for themselves.

That company has been seeking for many months past to procure from the President the approval of a map locating an extension of its road from the present terminus, about one hundred miles west of the Missouri River, to a point on the Union Pacific Road at or near the one hundredth meridian. This effort, as I have good reason to believe, has been made with much persistence, and by some of the ablest and most influential lawyers of the nation by printed briefs and reported oral arguments. One of the objects sought to be attained by procuring the approval of this map is to fix upon the Government a liability to issue to this company bonds of the United States to the amount of $16,000 per mile, and alternate sections of the public lands for a width of twenty miles on each side of the proposed extension; and as this extension will be not far from two hundred and fifty miles in length, the House will perceive that this is a proposition to take from the Government an aggregate of about $8,000,000—four millions in bonds and four millions in public lands.

That the House may see that I am not mistaken in stating this to be one of the objects which this railroad company has in view, I read a paragraph from the brief of Hon. William M. Evarts, submitted to the Solicitor-General. He says:

We are before you in substance in the position of parties having performed what we were desired to perform by the Government of the United States in order to complete this great public work, for the public benefit, and we call upon the Government to perform its promises under which this corporation and this devotion of capital was invited and has been devoted and has been received by the Government; and that is that we be permitted to lay out the route from the terminus of our first and original right of one hundred miles from the river, and receive an allotment of the lands, and as a consequence of the bonds under the act.

This case has been frequently before the Department of the Interior, and adverse decisions rendered thereon, to which I will allude hereafter, but which I have not seen; but the present Solicitor-General has directed to the President an opinion in its favor, and I find it stated in an argument by one of the counsel for the company that the Secretary of the Interior is of the opinion that the claim should be allowed. With the highest respect for the opinion of the Solicitor-General, and for that of the Secretary of the Interior if he entertains the opinion thus attributed to him, I am constrained to the conclusion that they are in error, and as this company thus proposes to secure this enormous subsidy of lands and bonds, in my judgment without legal right, I have felt it to be my duty to prevent it if possible, and therefore have introduced the bill to which the attention of the House is now invited. Without stopping here to recite in detail the provisions of the bill, it is sufficient for my present purpose to say that it forbids any officer or Department of the Government to recognize this claim, or in any way to commit the Government to the issuance of these bonds or lands to this company.

As I have no inclination to do any injustice to this railroad company, nor any desire to deprive it of any rights it may have acquired by virtue of any previous enactments of Congress, nor any disposition to throw an obstacle in the way of the enjoyment of such rights, I propose to examine the grounds upon which this demand is made, and to give some of the reasons why I think it is without legal support.

To properly understand the question involved it is necessary to consider portions of the acts of July 1, 1862, July 2, 1864, and July 3, 1866, in relation to the construction of the railroad and branches from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean. It will be remembered that on this side of the Rocky Mountains, in addition to the Union Pacific road, the acts of 1862 and 1864 provided for the construction of branches from different points on the Missouri River to form a union with the main line. Among these branches one was from the mouth of the Kansas River, now known as the Kansas Pacific road; and another was an extension authorized to be made by the Hannibal and Saint Joseph Railroad Company of Missouri, from Saint Joseph, via Atchison, Kansas. The one last referred to is what is now known as the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company, whose claim is now being considered, and it is out of the legislation of Congress touching these two branches that this claim arises. To this legislation I wish to call especial attention.

By the act of 1862, section 9, the Leavenworth, Pawnee and Western Railroad Company of Kansas (now the Kansas Pacific Railroad Company) was authorized to construct a railroad and telegraph line from the mouth of the Kansas River so as to connect with the Union Pacific Railroad on the one hundredth meridian, and was to receive lands and bonds—$16,000 per mile in bonds, and twenty sections per mile of lands. This road was to be located so as to enable the roads from Missouri and Iowa "herein authorized to connect with the same," to make that connection "within the limits prescribed in this act," provided the same could be done "without deviating from the general direction of the whole line to the Pacific coast." The route of this road, from the meridian of Fort Riley to the one hundredth meridian, was to be "subject to the approval of the President of the United States, to be determined by him on actual survey."

Section 13 of this act of 1862 is as follows:

SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the Hannibal and Saint Joseph Railroad Company of Missouri may extend its roads from Saint Joseph, via Atchison, to connect and unite with the road through Kansas, upon filing its assent to the provisions of this act, upon the same terms and conditions in all respects, for one hundred miles in length next to the Missouri River, as are provided in this act for the construction of the railroad and telegraph line first mentioned, and may for this purpose use any railroad charter which has been or may be granted by the Legislature of Kansas: Provided, That if actual survey shall render it desirable, the said company may construct their road, with the consent of the Kansas Legislature, on the most direct and practicable route west from Saint Joseph, Missouri, so as to connect and unite with the road leading from the western boundary of Iowa at any point east of the one hundredth meridian of west longitude, or with the main trunk road at said point; but in no event shall lands or bonds be given to said company, as herein directed, to aid in the construction of their said road for a greater distance than one hundred miles. And the Leavenworth, Pawnee and Western Railroad Company of Kansas may construct their road from Leavenworth to unite with the road through Kansas.

The Central Branch Union Pacific claims to be the successor or assignee of the Hannibal and Saint Joseph Railroad Company, named in this section. It has constructed one hundred miles of road west from the Missouri River, and has received bonds therefor, and has received or will receive the alternate sections of land for that length of road. From its present western terminus it proposes to extend its road to the one hundredth meridian, a distance, as I before stated, of nearly two hundred and fifty miles, and to demand from the Government lands and bonds aggregating in value about $8,000,000 additional, notwithstanding the provision of the section above quoted, that "in no event shall lands or bonds be given to aid in the construction of their road for a greater distance than one hundred miles."

I desire the House here to notice four points prominent in this section:

First. This Central Branch might connect with the Kansas Pacific.

Secondly. It might connect with the branch leading from the western boundary of Iowa at any point east of the one hundredth meridian.

Thirdly. It might connect at the one hundredth meridian.

Fourthly. Whether its western connection should be in the one direction or the other; whether to make that connection the length of road required was one hundred or one thousand miles, only subsidies of land and bonds were to be had for one hundred miles. Thus far in this legislation nothing can be plainer than that Congress intended only to give this company subsidies for one hundred miles of road.

In 1834 an amendatory act was passed, in the ninth section of which is the following language:

And provided further, That any company authorized by this act to construct its road and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the initial point aforesaid [one hundredth meridian] may construct its road and telegraph line so as to connect with the Union Pacific Railroad at any point westwardly of such initial point, in case such company shall deem such westward connection more practicable or desirable; and in aid of the construction of so much of its road and telegraph line as shall be a departure from the route hereinbefore provided for its road, such company shall be entitled to all the benefits, and be subject to all the conditions and restrictions of this act: Provided further, however, That the bonds of the United States shall not be issued to such company for a greater amount than is hereinbefore provided, if the same had united with the Union Pacific Railroad on the one hundredth degree of longitude; nor shall such company be entitled to receive any greater amount of alternate sections of public lands than are also herein provided.

This Central Branch Company, as I have already shown, was authorized by the act of 1862 to build to the one hundredth meridian; therefore the section last quoted is applicable to it, and thereby another option was given as to a western terminus, namely, to unite with the Union Pacific west of the one hundredth meridian; but Congress was again careful to provide that this company should only have lands and bonds for a distance of one hundred miles. This section also authorized the Kansas Pacific road to unite with the Union Pacific west of the one hundredth meridian.

The legislative intent is not left in doubt by these sections. Whenever Congress legislated specifically with reference to this road now under consideration, it has expressly restricted its subsidies of lands and bonds to a distance of one hundred miles. A basis for this claim must therefore be found elsewhere in these acts, if found at all.

But I desire the House to bear these sections in mind in connection with the interpretation of another section, and a subsequent statute. Section 16 of the act of 1864 is as follows:

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That any two or more of the companies, authorized to participate in the benefits of this act, are hereby authorized at any time to unite and consolidate their organizations, as the same may or shall be, upon such terms and conditions, and in such manner as they may agree upon, and as shall not be incompatible with this act or the laws of the State or States in which the roads of such companies may be, and to assume and adopt such corporate name and style as they may agree upon, with a capital stock not to exceed the actual cost of the roads so to be consolidated, and shall file a copy of such consolidation in the Department of the Interior; and thereupon such organization, so formed and consolidated, shall succeed to, possess, and be entitled to receive from the Government of the United States, all and singular, the grants, benefits, immunities, guarantees, acts, and things to be done and performed, and be subject to the same terms, conditions, restrictions, and requirements which said companies, respectively, at the time of such consolidation, are or may be entitled or subject to under this act, in place and substitution of said companies so consolidated, respectively. And all other provisions of this act, so far as applicable, relating or in any manner appertaining to the companies so consolidated, or either thereof, shall apply and be of force as to such consolidated organization. And in case, upon the completion by such consolidated organization of the roads, or either of them, of the companies so consolidated, any other of the road or roads of either of the other companies authorized as aforesaid (and forming, or intended or necessary to form, a portion of a continuous line from each of the several points on the Missouri River, hereinbefore designated, to the Pacific coast) shall not have constructed the number of miles of its said road within the time herein required, such consolidated organization is hereby authorized to continue the construction of its road and telegraph in the general direction and route upon which such incomplete or unconstructed road is hereinbefore authorized to be built, until such continuation of the road of such consolidated organization shall reach the constructed road and telegraph of said other company, and at such point to connect and unite therewith; and for and in aid thereof the said consolidated organization may do and perform, in reference to such portion of road and telegraph as shall so be in continuation of its constructed road and telegraph, and to the construction and equipment thereof, all and singular the several acts and things hereinbefore authorized or granted to be done by the company hereinbefore authorized to construct and equip the same, and shall be entitled to similar and like grants, benefits, immunities, guarantees, acts, and things to be done and performed by the Government of the United States, by the President of the United States, by the Secretaries of the Treasury and Interior, and by commissioners, in reference to such company, and to such portion of the road hereinbefore authorized to be constructed by it, and upon the like and similar terms and conditions so far as the same are applicable thereto. And said consolidated company shall pay to said defaulting company the value, to be estimated by competent engineers, of all the work done and material furnished by said defaulting company, which may be adopted and used by said consolidated company in the progress of the work under the provisions of this section: Provided, nevertheless, That said defaulting company may at any time before receiving pay for its said work and material, as hereinbefore provided, on its own election, pay said consolidated company the value of the work done and material furnished by said consolidated company, to be estimated by competent engineers, necessary for and used in the construction of the road of said defaulting company, and resume the control of its said road; and all the rights, benefits, and privileges which shall be acquired, possessed, or exercised, pursuant to this section, shall be to that extent an abatement of the rights, benefits, and privileges hereinbefore granted to such other company. And in case any company, authorized thereto, shall not enter into such consolidated organization, such company, upon the completion of its road as hereinbefore provided, shall be entitled to, and is hereby authorized to, continue and extend the same under the circumstances, and in accordance with the provisions of this section, and to have all the benefits thereof as fully and completely as are herein provided touching such consolidated organization. And in case more than one such consolidated organization shall be made, pursuant to this act, the terms and conditions of this act, hereinbefore recited as to one, shall apply in like manner, force, and effect to the other: Provided, however, That rights and interests at any time acquired by one such consolidated organization shall not be impaired by another thereof: It is further provided, That should the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California complete their line to the eastern line of the State of California before the line of the Union Pacific Railroad Company shall have been extended westward so as to meet the line of said first-named company, said first-named company may extend their line of road eastward one hundred and fifty miles, on the established route, so as to meet and connect with the line of the Union Pacific road, complying in all respects with the provisions and restrictions of this act as to said Union Pacific road, and upon doing so shall enjoy all the rights, privileges, and benefits conferred by this act on said Union Pacific Railroad Company.

I have quoted this section in full so that the attention of the House may be particularly attracted to it, but it may be briefly stated, so far as applicable to this case, thus: Where by these acts there was to be a union of two roads, the company that first reached the point of union might go on constructing along the line of the other until it reached the "constructed portion" of the latter, and should receive the bonds and lands the latter would have received if it had constructed to the point of union, or the bonds and lands appertaining to that portion of the road.

It will be remembered that the Kansas Pacific, by the act of 1862, was to be constructed from the mouth of the Kansas River to the one hundredth meridian, and that the Central Branch had the option to connect with the Kansas Pacific. Now, the basis of this claim is, that the Central Branch Company elected to connect with the Kansas Pacific; that when it had built one hundred miles of road and had reached the point where the connection should have been made, the Kansas Pacific had not constructed its road to that point, and, therefore, under the provisions of this sixteenth section, it (the Central Branch Company) has the right to continue on to the one hundredth meridian and to receive bonds and lands for the additional distance.

It is assumed—

First. That the Kansas Pacific was to build to the one hundredth meridian.

Secondly. That the act required the location of the Kansas Pacific to be so made as that the Central Branch could connect with it within one hundred miles west from the Missouri River, if it should elect to unite with that road.

Thirdly. That the Central Branch elected to unite with the Kansas Pacific.

Fourthly. That when it reached the end of the one hundred miles the Kansas Pacific had not built to that point.

From these premises the conclusion is asserted that the Central Branch has the right, under the sixteenth section, to go on and build a road from the present terminus to the one hundredth meridian, and to receive the lands and bonds that the Kansas Pacific would have received if it had constructed that portion of the road.

I have already shown by the statutes that the Kansas Pacific had the option to make its western terminus indefinitely west of the one hundredth meridian, and therefore the first proposition above is inaccurate, and I shall take occasion hereafter to show that the second is a bald assumption; that the statutes contain no provision requiring the Kansas Pacific to be located so as that the Central Branch could unite with it within one hundred miles west of the Missouri River.

Before considering these propositions and the arguments that have been based upon them by the learned counsel for this company, I call the attention of the House specially to the language of the sixteenth section, to show that this section does not and cannot be made to apply to this Central Branch Company, if the letter of the act is to govern. There is no argument that I have seen in favor of this claim that pretends that it has any foundation outside of this section, and if I can show from this and another section that it has no reference to this branch, it is an end of the controversy.

Now mark the language of this section. After providing that two or more companies may consolidate for purposes of construction, it proceeds as follows:

And in case, upon the completion by such consolidated organization of the roads, or either of them, of the companies so consolidated, any other of the road or roads of either of the other companies authorized as aforesaid (and forming, or intended or necessary to form, a portion of a continuous line from each of the several points on the Missouri River, hereinbefore designated, to the Pacific coast) shall not have constructed the number of miles of its said road within the time herein required, such consolidated organization is hereby authorized to continue the construction of its road and telegraph in the general direction and route upon which such incomplete or unconstructed road is hereinbefore authorized to be built, until such continuation of the road of such consolidated organization shall reach the constructed road and telegraph of said other company, and at such point to connect and unite therewith.

Then it is further provided that—

In case any company, authorized thereto, shall not enter into such consolidated organization, such company, upon the completion of its road, as hereinbefore provided for, shall be entitled to, and is hereby authorized to, continue and extend the same, under the circumstances and in accordance with the provisions of this section, and to have all the benefits thereof, &c.

This language cannot be made to apply to the Central Branch road in its relations to the Kansas Pacific. It can only apply to such roads, as by a continuation along the line of another road, will ultimately reach a constructed portion of the latter. It may build until it "shall reach the constructed road and telegraph of said other company, and at such point connect and unite therewith," is the language of the act. In the case of the Central Branch and the Kansas Pacific, in view of another provision, this is a physical impossibility.

Section 10 of the act of 1862 requires the Kansas Pacific to commence constructing at the mouth of the Kansas River, and to complete one hundred miles within two years after filing assent to the act, and one hundred miles each year thereafter. Congress, having required construction to be commenced at the mouth of the Kansas and progress to be made westwardly, did not intend that it should commence at the one hundredth meridian and work eastwardly. Consequently the Central Branch could not extend in the general direction from any western terminus so as to "unite with the constructed road" of the Kansas Pacific.

If the Central Branch should go on constructing in the "general direction" it would never unite with the Kansas Pacific, but when it reached the one hundredth meridian it would "connect and unite" with the Union Pacific. The Central Branch, therefore, does not come within the letter of the section.

But it may be contended that this Central Branch road comes within the spirit of the sixteenth section. For the sake of the argument let that be granted, and it will still not be entitled to what it claims, as I think I shall be able to show; in doing which it will be necessary to advert to some of the arguments which the attorneys of the company have been urging before the Departments.

Section 22 of the act of 1834, the same act in which this sixteenth section occurs under which this claim is made, is in these words:

Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act.

All that was done by any of these companies was in the view of this plain reservation of power. No company could claim that by filing a map or making a location any vested right to the subsidies was created, so as to prevent Congress from exercising this reserved right to "alter, amend, or repeal."

Now, Mr. Speaker, asking the House to bear in mind the fact that the ninth section of the act of 1864 authorized the Kansas Pacific to build its road to unite with the Union Pacific indefinitely westwardly of the one hundredth meridian, at any point that might be deemed advisable, I ask especial attention to an act approved July 3, 1866. I will read it:

An act to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," approved July 2, 1864.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Union Pacific Railway Company, Eastern Division, is hereby authorized to designate the general route of their said road, and to file a map thereof, as now required by law, at any time before the 1st day of December, 1866; and upon the filing of the said map, showing the general route of said road, the lands along the entire line thereof, so far as the same may be designated, shall be reserved from sale by order of the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That said company shall be entitled to only the same amount of the bonds of the United States to aid in the construction of their line of railroad and telegraph as they would have been entitled to if they had connected their said line with the Union Pacific Railroad on the one hundredth degree of longitude, as now required by law: And provided further, That said company shall connect their line of railroad and telegraph with the Union Pacific Railroad, but not at a point more than fifty miles westwardly from the meridian of Denver, in Colorado.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Union Pacific Railroad Company, with the consent and approval of the Secretary of the Interior, are hereby authorized to locate, construct, and continue their road from Omaha, in Nebraska Territory, westward, according to the best and most practicable route, and without reference to the initial point on the one hundredth meridian of west longitude, as now provided by law, in a continuous completed line, until they shall meet and connect with the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California; and the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, with the consent and approval of the Secretary of the Interior, are hereby authorized to locate, construct, and continue their road eastward, in a continuous completed line, until they shall meet and connect with the Union Pacific Railroad: Provided, That each of the above-named companies shall have the right, when the nature of the work to be done, by reason of deep cuts and tunnels, shall, for the expeditious construction of the Pacific Railroad, require it, to work for an extent of not to exceed three hundred miles in advance of their continuous completed lines.

It will be observed that by this act the Kansas Pacific, which by the act of 1862 was to connect with the Union Pacific at the one hundredth meridian, and by the act of 1864 at any point indefinitely westwardly of the one hundredth meridian, was limited in making a change of line, so as that the connection should not be more than fifty miles west of the meridian of Denver; and it is worthy of remark, although not essential to the argument, that, at the time of the passage of this last act, the Central Branch Company had not completed any portion of its road. Twenty miles of it were so far completed as to have been accepted by the Government a few days afterward. Pursuant to this act the Kansas Pacific Company changed the line of its road from the line originally contemplated, and located it from the meridian of Fort Riley westwardly to Denver, and thence to Cheyenne, on which route the road has since been built.

Now, sir, what was the effect of that act of July 3, 1866, and of this action of the Kansas Pacific Company pursuant thereto? It was to vacate, so to speak, any line of the Kansas Pacific for which provision had formerly been made from the meridian of Fort Riley to the one hundredth meridian. From the date of this new location no road was to be built by the Kansas Pacific between those two points.

Congress had reserved to itself the right to make any alteration that might be deemed advisable, and by the act of July 3, 1866, this alteration in this line was made, whether wisely or not it is not necessary to discuss. By the sixteenth section of the act of 1864, under which the Central Branch sets up this claim, that company only had the right to make that part of the line of the Kansas Pacific Company which the latter company did not make. The right of the Central Branch Company to construct a part of the line set apart to the Kansas Pacific was only a secondary right. The primary right was in the Kansas Pacific. The Central Branch could only succeed to a right possessed by the Kansas Pacific which the latter had failed to exercise. But the line of the Kansas Pacific was, under the act of 1866, removed from that locality altogether and placed farther west, and it has been constructed on the new location. It has not, therefore, failed to construct any portion of its line, and there is therefore nothing to which the Central Branch can succeed. The latter is claiming to succeed to the right of the Kansas Pacific to construct that portion of the original line of the Kansas Pacific lying between its terminus one hundred miles west of the Missouri River and the Union Pacific at the one hundredth meridian. But the Kansas Pacific has had no rights there since the legislation of 1866 to which it could succeed. All of the rights of the Kansas Pacific between those points ceased with that legislation and the action of that company pursuant thereto. Since then no road has been required to be built between those two points by the Kansas Pacific Company. It had no right to build a road there. Hence the Central Branch has no such right, and this claim is without legal foundation upon which to rest.

I find in the perusal of one of these briefs that to obviate this, to my mind, most manifest conclusion, it is contended on behalf of this claim that the road built by the Kansas Pacific after the passage of the act of 1866, and pursuant to that act, is not one of the roads or branches contemplated by the acts of 1862 and 1864. In other words, it is insisted that Congress in passing the act of 1866 made provision for a new, or an additional, road.

The language used in this brief is this:

After a careful examination of the act of 1866, we find it to be no more nor no less than legislation granting a new franchise to the Kansas Pacific Company in respect to that portion of the road lying west of the meridian of Fort Riley.

And the conclusion is drawn that the original route of the Kansas Pacific between the meridian of Fort Riley and the one hundredth meridian was left remaining, and is now open to be constructed by the Central Branch Company. This position was necessary to be resorted to, to avoid the force of the point that Congress had, by the act of 1866, made a diversion or deflection of that route.

But, sir, this assumption that a "new franchise" was created by that act is grossly at variance with the act itself. The title of the act which I have before read declares it to be an act amendatory of the act of 1864, which was amendatory of the act of 1862.

And now listen to the language of the act itself, as found in section 1, which I have before read, but which I must repeat here to show upon what baseless premises this argument is made:

Be it enacted &c., That the Union Pacific Railway Company, Eastern Division—

The name had been changed from the Leavenworth, Pawnee and Western to Union Pacific, Eastern Division, and has since been changed to the Kansas Pacific—is hereby authorized to designate the general route of their said road—

I pause, sir, to ask what "said road" is here referred to? Is it a new road, separate and distinct from any before authorized? As I said before, this was an act amending the act of 1864, which amended the act of 1862. Those acts authorized this company to build from the mouth of the Kansas River to the Union Pacific at the one hundredth meridian, and that is the only road which this company had anything to do with under those acts. The language, therefore, "their said road" refers to this, and cannot refer to anything else. The section proceeds—and to file a map thereof as now required by law before the 1st day of December, 1866.

I pause again to call attention to this language. This company was authorized to "file a map" of their general route as now required by law. But the counsel making this argument insists that this is a new road or franchise being provided for. If this is so, then there must have been something "now required by law," with reference to a road that did not, at that time, have even legislative authority for an existence. This is such a palpable absurdity that perhaps I should apologize to the House for wasting time upon it. But, inasmuch as this is one of the arguments or theories upon which it is proposed to relieve the public of a few millions, I will read the first proviso in this section:

Provided, That said company shall be entitled to only the same amount of the bonds of the United States to aid in the construction of their line of railroad and telegraph as they would have been entitled to if they had connected their said line with the Union Pacific Railroad, on the one hundredth degree of longitude, as now required by law.

Is it not too manifest for argument that Congress was treating of a road already provided for by law, and that that was a road which it had been provided might connect with the Union Pacific at the one hundredth meridian? That road was this same Kansas Pacific. It was not a "new road" for which provision was being made, but changes were being made in relation to one that had already been "provided" for "by law."

Mr. Speaker, out West when a question is started which is too difficult for the wisest, it is commonly said of it that it would "puzzle a Philadelphia lawyer." If all the wisdom of all the lawyers of Philadelphia, living or dead, with those of New York and New England thrown in, were concentrated together, melted down, purified, and refined, until it was the very fine gold of wisdom, it would be inadequate to the task of demonstrating that the language of this section has reference to some new road for the construction of which Congress was making provision in this section, and not for a change of the line of one already authorized to be constructed to the one hundredth meridian. Nothing can be plainer than that Congress was legislating with reference to this road from the mouth of the Kansas, authorized by the acts of 1862 and 1864; and the next proviso shows that its route or location was to be changed. I will read it:

And provided further, That said company shall connect their line of railroad and telegraph with the Union Pacific Railroad, but not at a point more than fifty miles westwardly from the meridian of Denver in Colorado.

But it is further argued by these learned lawyers that the act of 1866 does not divest the Central Branch Company of this right of extension unless it repeals the portion of the act of 1864 under which it might have made the extension. They say that it does not, in express words, repeal any portion of the act of 1864. And they contend that there is no repeal by implication, because both acts can stand together; that, the one not being inconsistent with the other, both can be executed.

Well, sir, I do not pretend that the act of 1866 repealed the act of 1862 or 1864, or any part of either. By these acts Congress did not pretend to designate the particular ground upon which any of these roads should be built. They designated terminal points on the Missouri River, leaving the western terminal points indefinite, and reserved the right to "alter" the lines at any time. Congress did not intend, by the act of 1866, to repeal the authority to build the Kansas Pacific road, but it did exercise its expressly-reserved right to alter the western terminus of that road, which involved a change of line. And I agree with these learned gentlemen that both acts can be executed. The Central Branch may build so as to connect with the Kansas Pacific, or it may build to the one hundredth meridian, or to points east or west of that meridian. That was what it might do originally, and it has the same rights still, if by laches they have not been lost; but, in the language of the act—

In no event shall it receive lands or bonds for a greater distance than one hundred miles.

But these gentlemen in their arguments assume that the original act required the Kansas Pacific road to be so located that the Central Branch could connect with it within one hundred miles west from the Missouri River; and upon this assumption, which I shall presently show is entirely without foundation in fact, they base an argument, and the Solicitor-General bases an opinion, which I now propose to notice.

In his opinion, as reported, the Solicitor-General says:

After the filing of the map of July 1, 1855, (i. e., by the Kansas Pacific, locating to the one hundredth meridian) and the subsequent election of the Central Branch Company, (i. e., to build to unite with the Kansas Pacific Company) the United States, the Kansas Company, and the Central Branch Company were all parties to a contract by which, among other things, the Kansas Company stipulated that at the end of a road of less than one hundred miles in extent the Central Company should find the Pacific Railroad to connect with. I apprehend there is no principle of law by which two of these parties could, against the will of the third, rescind such contract.

Further on in the opinion he says:

Upon the whole, from the course of legislation and the conduct of the parties, I entertain no doubt that at the time of the passage of the act of 1866, a trilateral contract existed between the United States, the Kansas Company, and the Central Branch Company; that by such contract it was contemplated that the Kansas Company by non-action, might yield its right to construct a road from the meridian of Fort Riley to the one hundredth meridian; and in that case such right would devolve upon the Central Branch Company, &c.

The House will see that, to reach this conclusion, the Solicitor asserts as a fact that the Kansas Pacific was by this legislation to be so located; that the Central Branch could connect with it within one hundred miles. I assert, most unqualifiedly, that there is no such provision in the act, nor any provision that will bear any such construction.

I will read to the House the portions of the act bearing upon this subject. In section 9 of the act of 1862, there is the following:

And said railroad through Kansas [Kansas Pacific] shall be so located between the mouth of the Kansas River as aforesaid and the aforesaid point on the one hundredth meridian of longitude, that the several railroads from Missouri and Iowa herein authorized to connect with the same can make connection within the limits prescribed in this act, provided the same can be done without deviating from the general direction of the whole line to the Pacific coast.

It will be very difficult to find what the "limits" referred to in this paragraph are.

But the advocates of this claim assert that is a connection with the Kansas Pacific within one hundred miles. I will read the provision of the act upon which they rely; and I may add that it is the only one, directly or indirectly, nearly or remotely relating to this matter.

I read the thirteenth section of the act of 1862:

The Hannibal and Saint Joseph Railroad Company, of Missouri, [now Central Branch,] may next extend its roads from Saint Joseph via Atchison to connect and unite with the road through Kansas upon filing its assent to the provisions of this act, upon the same terms and conditions in all respects, for one hundred miles in length next to the Missouri River, as are provided in this act for the construction of the railroad and telegraph line first mentioned, and for this purpose use any railroad charter which has been or may be granted by the Legislature of Kansas.

Now, sir, that is the only provision fixing any "limits" within which the Kansas Pacific must be located; and I most respectfully submit that it fixes no limits whatever. It would require very vigorous and ingenious construction of language to make this mean that the Kansas Pacific should be located so that the Central Branch could connect with it within one hundred miles west from the Missouri River. It is simply a provision that the Hannibal and Saint Joseph road may extend so as to unite with the road through Kansas; and, as to the distance of one hundred miles west from the Missouri River, it shall have the same terms and conditions in all respects as are accorded to the Union Pacific. It can have bonds for one hundred miles, and lands for one hundred miles, &c., and no farther; but that the union is to be effected within one hundred miles cannot be tortured out of this language. Not only will the language not support any such hypothesis or assumption, but subsequent provisions show that no such idea was entertained. The same section in which the language to which I have been referring occurs further provides that this Hannibal and Saint Joseph road (Central Branch) may unite with a branch from Iowa, or may unite with the Union Pacific at the one hundredth meridian, at its option; and then follow these words:

But in no event shall lands or bonds be given to said company, as herein directed, to aid in the construction of their said road for a greater distance than one hundred miles.

Thus showing conclusively that the "hundred miles" limitation was as to the benefits to be received, and not as to the point where the union of the two roads was to be effected. Nor is this all. By section 9 of the act of 1834 the Kansas Pacific was authorized to construct its road so as to connect with the Union Pacific at any point west of the one hundredth meridian—no matter how far west. It could have gone to Cheyenne, as it has since gone. It needs no diagram to show that if it went west for a connecting point the distance for the Central Branch to traverse in order to connect with this road through Kansas must be increased also. It might require a distance of two, three, four, or even five hundred miles, depending upon where the western terminus of the Kansas Pacific road might be located.

Is it not perfectly apparent from this that Congress did not intend to require this Kansas Pacific road to be located so that the Central Branch could unite with it within the limit of one hundred miles? This provision expressly authorized it to do otherwise.

And, again, in this section it is provided that no more lands or bonds should be issued than had before been specified. The location might be changed, the lines might be lengthened, but the subsidies should not be increased.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that whoever will carefully look at these acts must come to the conclusion that this idea that the Kansas Pacific road was required to be located so that the Central Branch Company could unite with it within one hundred miles is the merest figment of the brain. And yet upon this assumption, this fiction, is built an argument in favor of putting an additional strain upon the public credit, and turning over to this corporation an enormous subsidy of public lands.

The Solicitor-General says it will be observed that the United States and the Kansas Pacific Company stipulated that "at the end of a road less than one hundred miles in extent the Central Company should find the Pacific road to connect with." I do not pretend to know what the Central Company expected to find at the end of one hundred miles, but I think I can safely assert that it had no right to indulge in the expectation that it would find the Kansas Pacific road there. In support of this I will state some facts that will be verified by the record.

First. The Kansas Pacific never, at any time, filed a map of definite location west of the meridian of Fort Riley to the one hundredth meridian.

Secondly. The President never approved of a route for that road west of the meridian of Fort Riley to that meridian. But the ninth section of the act of 1862 provides that the portion of the route between these two meridians shall be subject to the approval of the President, and to be determined by him on actual survey There never was any "actual survey."

The location of this part of the route, therefore, was entirely uncertain. Until this survey was made, and the President's approval secured, it was impossible to know the distance that this portion of the route would lie west of the Missouri River, and it is idle, therefore, to talk of this Central Branch Company expecting to find the Kansas Pacific to connect with at the end of their one hundred miles, and it is still more idle to talk of a contract that it should be there. Its location was wholly indefinite under the act of 1862, and, if possible, more so under the act of 1864, when it was authorized to move indefinitely westwardly. When these maps were filed it was not known where the Kansas Pacific would be built. Having never been definitely located, and the Kansas Pacific Company having the right to go as far west with its road as it desired, there was no ground for expectation that the road would be located at any particular place, and none could have been reasonably entertained.

The Solicitor-General, it will be perceived, comes to the conclusion that this legislation and the filing of maps by the companies makes the United States a party to a trilateral contract that the Central Company might build from the meridian of Fort Riley to the one hundredth meridian if the Kansas Company did not do so.

Having shown that the act does not require the location to be within one hundred miles, there is no ground left for this contract theory to stand upon.

But, sir, independent of this, did the United States enter into any such contract? Conceding, for the sake of the argument, that what was done was in the broadest and strictest sense a contract, was it such a contract as is intimated by the learned Solicitor? No, sir. On the contrary, the United States expressly reserved therein the right to alter, amend, or abrogate it altogether "at any time," and it reserved this right for the purpose expressed in the act itself, or, if you please, the contract, namely, "to promote the public interest and welfare." Congress was making vast grants or subsidies to these corporations of public lands and public credit, and therefore most wisely reserved the right to make such alterations in regard to the construction of these roads as the "public interest" required. When this Central Branch Company filed its assent to the provisions of this legislation, as it was required to do before it could acquire any rights thereunder, it assented to this right which Congress had reserved to itself.

The exercise of this right to change the location of the Kansas Pacific road by the act of July 3, 1866, was no violation of any contract into which the United States had entered, but was in direct accordance with the express, direct, unequivocal stipulations or provisions of the act.

In the examination of this question I have with much interest considered the printed arguments submitted to the Solicitor-General by the counsel for this Central Branch Company. The reputation they have for great learning and ability, and which they so justly deserve, will possibly have more force in sustaining any position they may have assumed than any argument I might be able to urge in its refutation.

I find them also, upon the assumption of the one hundred mile limit, arguing, as does the Solicitor-General in substance, that by the passage of these acts, and by the filing of these maps by the companies, the right to build this road in the particular place where the Central Branch Company now seeks to build it, and consequently the right to the lands and bonds, became vested rights, and of course, if vested, not to be divested. I have an answer to this that is satisfactory to my mind, however little weight it may have in the minds of others as against these learned gentlemen. It is found in the language of the acts I have already quoted, namely, that Congress may "at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act."

Now, to adopt the doctine of "vested rights" is to deprive Congress of this expressly reserved right. If this doctrine of "vested rights" is sound, then it was in the power of these companies to file their maps of location, and thereby to cut off the right of Congress thus reserved in the interest of the public. The effect of the doctrine would be to enable these companies to say to Congress, "You did not exercise the right to alter, amend, or repeal before our maps were filed—it cannot be done afterwards;" when the contract between the parties, if it must be called a contract, was that Congress might do that "at any time." If it was a contract, Congress has done no more by the passage of the act of 1866 than the contract authorized.

Mr. Speaker, whoever will give himself the pleasure to read the ingenious briefs that have been submitted in support of this claim, will find another consideration strongly urged in its favor. It is contended that those interested in this corporation, having placed their money in this one hundred miles of road upon the faith that the Kansas Pacific would be built to the one hundredth meridian, it would now be inequitable to deny this application, and therefore that the President should approve this map and thereby sanction this claim, notwithstanding the act of 1866.

I think I have shown that that act had the effect to remove the line of the Kansas Pacific, so that now there is no law authorizing that company to build to the one hundredth meridian, and therefore nothing to which the Central Branch could succeed. If that is the case, then these gentlemen have made their application at the wrong place. The President has no power to settle and adjust equities. No Department has any such power in such a case as this. To administer the law as Congress has made it, right or wrong, is the extent of executive power in this behalf. If Congress has done an inequitable thing, they must come to Congress for a redress of their grievances; and when they come here, it may, and doubtless will, become interesting to inquire whether this company, that talks through counsel about equity, has ever complied with the law under which it is acting, so as to entitle it to favorable consideration; and when the investment of money is urged, it may be still more interesting to know whether the Government did not by subsidies furnish all the means expended in the construction of the existing one hundred miles. And it may furthermore be very interesting to know whether the subsidies already received by this company were not received without legal right.

Thus far, Mr. Speaker, I have presented this case upon the construction of these statutes. There is one other view of the case to which I will briefly call the attention of the House.

Those who have been and still are pressing this demand made it as long ago as 1866. Mr. Browning, then Secretary of the Interior, decided against it. I refer the House to his letter, of date February 19, 1867, and also to his annual report, November 3, 1868, page 16.

It was again brought before that Department, and again it was decided adversely to the claimants, when Mr. Cox was Secretary of the Interior.

And yet again it was brought before the same Department, and was referred by Mr. Delano to Attorney-General Akerman, who decided against it. The opinion will be found in volume 13 Opinions of Attorneys-General, page 430.

With a persistence worthy, in my judgment, a more righteous cause, it is again exhumed, brought before the Solicitor-General, and he has given the opinion to which I have adverted.

Now, sir, this case is res adjudicata. These former decisions, adverse to this demand, are conclusive of the question. The decisions of the Secretaries to which I have alluded are conclusive upon their successors.

In support of this proposition I refer to the following authorities, which I cannot now read for want of time:

First. The opinion in the case of the Western Pacific Railroad Company, (13 Opinions of Attorneys-General, 387,) and authorities there cited.

Secondly. Case of R. H. McGoon, (13 Opinions of Attorneys-General, 457,) and authorities cited.

There are other considerations connected with this case which I shall bring to the attention of the House hereafter if necessary, relating to the action of Congress in the passage of the act, and the action of these companies in regard to filing maps, and in relation to motives which influenced the Central Branch Company to take the route that was taken. I cannot do so now for want of time.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should apologize for having made the reference I have to the briefs of counsel and the opinion of the Solicitor-General in connection with this matter. The apology that I have to offer is simply this: This application on behalf of this company before the Solicitor-General was ex parte in its character. While there are millions involved, in which the Government (which is but another name for the people) is directly interested, it happens to be the fact that there is no one whose duty it is to appear before the Solicitor-General and represent the interests of the people even in an affair of so much moment. Here, then, is the only place where these arguments by which this claim is urged can be answered. I may not have successfully answered them, but I have brought them and the subject to the attention of the House. After having examined them, in connection with the acts of Congress to which I have referred, I am convinced that there is no existing law which will entitle this company to lands and bonds for their proposed extension; and if I am right in that conclusion it is not only eminently proper but it is the duty of Congress to set this question at rest.

We know how persistently claims of this character may be urged. We know how the presentation may be, and most likely will be, repeated. In a case like this, involving so many millions, unless something is done to prevent it we may expect it will be renewed from time to time, more especially as this corporation has the Solicitor-General on its side, and professes to have the Secretary of the Interior on its side also; and, in the end, it may in some way be fastened upon the Government. If the President had followed the advice of the Solicitor-General already this company would have gained a position from which it could fight with great advantage. I trust the House will, by the passage of this bill, render it impossible for this company to press this demand any further in the direction it has been pursuing.

And I venture to say further, that there should be no delay in this behalf. Late in the last Congress an act was passed to procure a judicial determination of the rights of the Government growing out of the legislation of Congress for the construction of the Union Pacific Railroad and the acts of the parties who constructed it. Under that act the Attorney-General brought a suit; and in an argument against the constitutionality of the act a learned lawyer characterized it as an act that "was passed by a Congress in its expiring hours, agitated with its own reputation."

While this Congress is yet young and in the full vigor of its integrity, and before it has been subjected to the sophistries and blandishments of those whose tongues are oily with the fatness of an already largely subsidized corporation, and while, therefore, it has no occasion to be "agitated with its own reputation," I trust it will, by the passage of the act I have introduced, give a quietus to this claim, and relieve the President from being further importuned on the subject.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] a question before he resumes his seat.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. KELLOGG] has the floor.

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas for a question merely.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I desire to address a question to the gentleman from Indiana, in no spirit of hostility to his argument, but with a view to arrive at the real facts in the case. I understood the gentleman to state that the Kansas Pacific Railroad never laid out nor contemplated to lay out its main line westward from Fort Riley up the Republican Valley in the direction of Fort Kearney, to connect with the Union Pacific at the one hundredth meridian. Did it not, prior to the passage of the act of 1866, file a map for its line up the Republican Valley westward from Fort Riley; and in consequence was not the land in the valley along the line of said railroad withdrawn from market by the Government prior to the passage of that act of 1866?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. The Kansas Pacific did file a map of general location between Fort Riley and the one hundredth meridian, but not a map of definite location; nor was there ever a survey of route made. After the filing of the map the land was withdrawn from sale, but, after the passage of the act, was restored to market.

CURRENCY.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. Speaker, for the first time in almost five years I have been in the House I have risen here to-day to address the House on what is known as debate day, or Saturday, and I do not expect to occupy nearly an hour in anything I may say to the House to-day. I did not know until an hour ago that I could have any opportunity to speak to-day, and had it not been for the kindness of my friend from Nevada, [Mr. KENDALL,] for which I thank him heartily, I should not have had the floor; and I am not here with any prepared or written speech, but merely for the purpose of replying to some views that I have heard thrown out all around me since we assembled at the opening of this session of Congress.

I have heard frequently from our good friends of the South and West, since the beginning of this session, "You in New England and in the Eastern States have got more than your share of the national currency, the national-bank circulation; and if you of the East do not give us more currency we will take away some of yours;" and I propose, in the brief period I occupy here to-day, to show how we came by it, how we were forced to take it, and to ask my good friends from the South and West what they are going to do about it. Sir, I do not assume to speak for New England; I am not commissioned as her champion on this floor; but I do speak, and I have a right to speak, for the largest district in my own State, which I represent here; a district of intelligence, of refinement, and of wealth, and a perfect hive of busy and energetic industry; and a district whose active, intelligent business men have views large enough and broad enough to comprehend and seek to promote the interests, not only of their own State and section, but of the whole country. I usually find work enough on Saturdays for my constituents to occupy my time without indulging in speeches here. Yet some unfair and mistaken things have been said here, and have been so often repeated that I now feel like making some reply to them.

But before proceeding to this subject I want to allude to views which I have heard expressed on the floor of this House, from the time we met, on the 1st of December, that our late panic—as our friends the expansionists allege—was owing wholly or almost entirely to the fact that we had not currency enough in this country; that we had so little in proportion to the wants of the business community that a few men in New York with immense capital were able to lock it up and to cause the panic that spread so much distress all through this country.

I must differ with those gentlemen, for I believe we have had an abundant currency all through the late years for the legitimate business of this country; and while I would not urge here any contraction of the currency to any extent, I should not urge and shall not by my vote, if I know it, consent to any material expansion. I believe the business people of the country want no violent contraction or expansion. I believe they want a settled, stable, permanent policy; that they want this Congress to let them know very soon what their intention is about legislation in regard to the currency question.

Now, in regard to the late panic, it was a peculiar panic in some respects. It differed from any other panic the country has ever known. There was no fear about the soundness or value of our money in that panic. The only difficulty was that the money was so good that every one kept all he had on hand, and all he could get hold of; and every man, woman, and child who could get hold of it fastened upon it and hoarded it, and that increased the distress. I do not look upon that panic as growing out of any lack of currency. It grew rather out of an overexpansion of all kinds of business, and a wild speculation which I may say embraced almost every branch of business throughout the country; and this chiefly led to the lock-up in New York and to the panic. It was not the railroad enterprises alone that were expanded; it was not alone Jay Cooke & Co. with the Northern Pacific project; it was not alone your railroad projects in the West, where you have attempted to build as much railroad in one year as you ought to take five years to build. There was a wild speculation, I will admit, in regard to railroad enterprises all through the country, and the people were endeavoring to do too much and to go too fast; but it was not confined to the railroad enterprises.

Take our manufacturing industries in New England. When you find a leading manufacturing concern, with its branches of business ramifying through all parts of the country, and standing among the first and foremost of the manufacturers of New England for wealth and enterprise; and when you find such a manufacturing company with assets of nineteen millions, and owing fourteen or fifteen millions, with bills coming due for purchases of materials and labor of hundreds of thousands per month, I ask what is possible for men so situated to do except to suspend in time of sudden pressure? When orders stop, the machinery and labor must stop also, with such a mountain load of debt. Take also the mercantile community. When you find one of your leading houses in New York City, one of the first and foremost in enterprise and energy of all the mercantile concerns in this country, with twenty-one millions of assets, and owing fifteen or sixteen millions, how in the world are they going to meet their hundreds of thousands of bills coming due every week in time of sudden pressure or lock-up of money? And so in every branch of business. The American people, during years of prosperity, had been growing rich as they thought faster than they had ever dreamed in their most sanguine expectations, and they had run wild in speculations in almost every branch of business. There will always be a pressure and panic following such a condition of speculation; there always has been, from 1837 down to this time, and before then. There will be South Sea bubbles and there will be wild speculations wherever a people has a redundant currency, over and above what is demanded for the legitimate and well-beaten paths of business, that men will more safely tread when there is no inducement to lead them aside by an overexpanded currency. I look upon this late panic not as arising from any lack of currency. After careful reflection and study of the views of others more familiar with our wide-spread business than myself, I look upon this panic as a necessary corollary, following of necessity the expansion of business that men in almost all branches of industry in this country had been led into during the last two or three years.

But, sir, I rose more particularly to speak to my friends here from the South and West in reply to their oft-repeated claims, that we have too much of the currency in the North and East; that we have more than our share of banking currency; that we in New England have more than our share, and they are going for us; that we have in the States of New York and Pennsylvania several million above the pro rata share of those States. I want to tell gentlemen how we came by it, and how we were obliged to take it. The first national bank organized under our national-banking law, if I remember aright, was organized in 1863 in the city of Philadelphia, with a capital of $1,000,000; and I remember that my predecessor on this floor, who represented my district all through the war—a gentleman of wealth, and energy, and patriotism—came home about that time with a special appeal from Secretary Chase to go home and organize one of these national banks for the purpose of saving the Government in the hour of its necessity and distress. The gentleman I refer to is well known to gentlemen on this floor, and my friend from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] remembers him. He has been honored with an election as governor of my State for several years since he retired from Congress. He came home with that special appeal from Secretary Chase, and, with four other patriotic gentlemen of wealth and energy and faith in the future of the country, living in the city of New Haven, in my district, organized the second national bank that was organized in the country under that law, with a capital of $500,000. One of the next two national banks organized was also organized in Connecticut; and this was done at the special solicitation of the Secretary of the Treasury in the darkest hour of our country's trial, and when the Government was appealing to her patriotic citizens to furnish the sinews and means of carrying on the war.

That was where and when we began to acquire our national-bank circulation in Connecticut, when some were even telling us the bonds would not be worth the paper on which they were printed. I will admit that for a considerable period after this time there was a much less amount of national-bank capital taken up in Connecticut and in the other New England States than there was in some of the Western States; and I shall allude to that in another point of view by and by. We had an excellent banking system in our State, as most of the New England States had; a banking system that had been growing up for from fifty to sixty years under State legislation, and our bank-notes were at a premium in many parts of the West before the war. Before the war I could have gone to one large State in the West with a package of Connecticut bank-notes, and got in exchange for them some 20 or 30 per cent. in addition of their own State-bank currency, and had a pocket full of red-dog and wild-cat notes of that section to come home with, but of very little use after I got home; and of our circulation, a large portion of that of eastern banks was scattered over the West. We had a State-bank circulation that stood high all over the country, and our banking capital disliked to be obliged to go through the expense and inconvenience of withdrawing all the State-bank notes, and adopting the national-bank note system, when we had already the means of helping the Government through our State-bank circulation, and were giving it freely and with full hands. Nevertheless, gentlemen, you obliged us to do it. Congress taxed all of our State-bank circulation out of existence. They compelled every one of our banks to reorganize under the national-banking law; to surrender their State organizations, and to buy bonds of the Government for the purpose of strengthening the Government, and to take the national-bank circulation. In that way we got some eight or ten million dollars more that our quota, as you now figure it up, in my own State, and in that way only. And it has been some six or eight years since we have been enabled to get a national bank organized in any portion of the State, however much the business of the section had increased, and however much that increased business demanded and called for it. Where business has sprung up, as it has in some places in my own section, additional banks would be to-day organized if you gave them a chance. We were compelled by your legislation on this floor to surrender all our State-bank circulation, and to take national circulation in exchange; and in that way we got more than our share, as you call it, perhaps, of the national-bank circulation. More than our share; when you compelled us to turn the accumulated bank capital of seventy years of toil and industry into the one broad channel of national banking! And do you find fault with us now for obeying in good faith the provisions of the law you imposed upon us? You find fault in one breath because we have to pay so large an amount of interest to the foreign bondholders, causing a yearly drain upon the specie of the country, and in the next breath you find fault with us for making a market, in obedience to your law, for three hundred millions of bonds at home and keeping the interest here.

I have a few words more in regard to this complaint that I have heard several members make upon this floor, and which seems to be re-echoed by the press of the South and West, that we have more than our fair share of circulation; and that unless we will consent, here and now, to give you eighty or one hundred millions more of national currency or greenbacks—in a measure which we think most disastrous and ruinous to the whole country, to your interests and to ours—in some way or other you are going to take away the surplus over our share of circulation, as you call it.

Mr. JEWETT. Have you more circulation than you need?

Mr. KELLOGG. We have not in our section, and we cannot keep what we have got. There are from five to ten millions of our circulation to-day out in your Western States. We cannot keep enough for our business purposes at some seasons of the year, because men go to the West with it, and get 10 and 12 per cent. interest upon it, when they cannot get more than 6 or 7 per cent. with us.

Mr. JEWETT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him another question?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. JEWETT. If you have in the East no more national-bank currency than you want, why do you object to the West having what they want?

Mr. KELLOGG. We do not object to the West having what they want. We are giving up millions of our currency every day to the West, and helping you out in this very matter. And I will say to the gentleman that if he will go into a bank in Cleveland, or Chicago, or Saint Louis, and obtain a package of bank-notes on a check, he will find that more than one-half of those notes thus paid him were issued by banks in New York and the Eastern States rather than by banks in the West.

Mr. JEWETT. I understand the gentleman to say that in the East they have no more currency than they need.

Mr. KELLOGG. So I say. Our business requires a great deal of bank currency.

Mr. JEWETT. I understand the gentleman to say that he does not object to the West having more.

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly not; whenever you have the capital to take it up, or the business to employ it.

Mr. JEWETT. Then why will not the gentleman consent to the passage of a law that will give us more?

Mr. KELLOGG. A free-banking law?

Mr. JEWETT. Any law that will accomplish that purpose.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will come to that in a moment; and I will strike hands with gentlemen from the West upon the matter if they will take up more bank capital and reduce the volume of greenbacks, so as to get within sight of specie payments. In a few moments I will endeavor to show why they have not so much currency in the West as they would like. First, I will read an extract published in a paper in this city since the debate in this House on Saturday last. It is an article upon the distribution of the currency, and commenting especially upon that of the six New England States. The figures are the same as were given by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUNDY] in his speech on Saturday last. The extract is as follows:

> This unequal distribution of the currency explains the comfortable feeling of New England and the determined fight she is making to defeat a change. For the same reason she advocates the resumption of specie payments, knowing full well that the enactment of such a law would necessitate a curtailment of the present issue, not so much among her own banks as in other States, and particularly in the West, and this would add very largely to her present control, or rather monopoly, of the circulating medium of the country; her people being so educated that in times of panics they seldom, if ever, drain their banks of its reserved coin, but rather aid them. But this is not the case in other sections, because the people of these sections know that their banks do not have the same advantage of self-protection as those enjoyed by New England. To sum up the case a little stronger, here are the exact figures, taken from official documents, open to all who feel an interest in this question. They show the locality, excess of issue, deficiency and per capita circulation:

Locality.	Excess of issue.	Deficiency.	Per capita.
Six New England States	$70,690,046		$31 68
Five Middle States	9,416,503		12 82
Nine Western States		$21,423,811	7 09
Fifteen Southern States		51,271,034	2 91
Pacific States and Territories		7,625,000	1 82

> With facts so incontrovertible as these we are at a loss to understand why members of Congress representing the Middle, Western, and Southern States are so blind to their own interests. They seem not to care about the people they claim to represent, and the cries of "no work" and "no bread" that come up from all their districts, or their ignorance is of the most criminal character, and one that in almost any other country would be followed by revolution.
> If plenty of currency makes New England comfortable—if it renders her banks solvent and easy at all times, and especially during a crisis—why not the same facilities for other sections? The whole course of the East in this matter is not only selfish, but mean; and we think it is time that members of Congress open their eyes to the real situation. There was a time when Congress legislated exclusively for one section—when all others bowed with disgraceful acquiescence to its demands; but to-day we are living under a new dispensation of equality, and whatever good there is in national legislation belongs to the whole country.
> If we are to have no more currency—if the East is sincere in its opposition to an increase—then, we say in all fairness, let there be an equal distribution of what there is; to put it plain—a new deal. Let the argument be sent home for experiment, and, our word for it, New England will get enough of the cry of "no more currency." The people are getting tired of this trifling away of their time, and members of Congress who have their interests at heart should open their eyes to the fact at once.

I will come now to the first point to which the gentleman called my attention, why the West has no more currency.

Mr. NIBLACK. Will the gentleman state from what paper he has been reading?

Mr. KELLOGG. From a newspaper, the Sunday Morning Chronicle, I think, published in this city since the debate of Saturday last, reflecting, though with more severity, the same sentiments to some extent which the gentleman will find in speeches uttered on this floor a week ago to-day and before in this session.

Now let us see why the West has not so much of this national-bank currency issued on their own soil. Allow me to say to my friend from Ohio right here that under the provisions of our national banking law it makes no sort of difference whether the bills with which he carries on his business are issued in Chicago and Saint Louis or in New York and Boston. The notes of all the banks circulate freely all over the country, and when they go from one section to another section where the necessities of business require, then they will remain there.

Mr. JEWETT. Allow me——

Mr. KELLOGG. Do not interrupt me further now. I have already agreed to yield twenty minutes of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] and the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE.]

I am coming now to the reason why the West has not its share of banking currency. As I have said, the organization of the national banks was commenced in June, 1863. It was December 21, I think, when the first national-bank notes were issued in Philadelphia. We all remember that a distinguished gentleman from Ohio, since Chief Justice, and now deceased, was then Secretary of the Treasury. He set his heart upon carrying this national-bank system into immediate operation and retiring the greenbacks; for I know from the best authority that that was his idea—retiring the greenbacks as soon as it could be done after the necessity which called them into existence had ceased to exist. They were issued as a necessity of war; and it was not expected that they should continue for all time to be the currency of the country.

Of course in his own State Secretary Chase had a wonderful influence with all his friends. And we find that of the very first banks that were organized a great portion were located in the State of Ohio. I have here a list of the first hundred banks that were organized under the national banking law, a list furnished by the Treasury Department. By that list it appears that twenty-eight, or more than one-quarter of those banks, were organized in the State of Ohio alone. I commend them for it; I honor their patriotism and their energy in responding to the patriotic appeal of their own Secretary of the Treasury to come forward and push on the wheels of Government and carry it, if possible, through the great struggle. I find twenty-eight of the first hundred banks organized located in Ohio, with a capital of $5,925,000. Two of the first four organized, as I have said, were located in my own State. Of the first two hundred only five were organized in my State, for the reason I have already given, that we had a State-bank organization well managed and a State-bank circulation, and which gave us an amount of currency more than equal to the quota we were entitled to under the national banking law. We responded to the call of the Government for aid, as you did in the State of Ohio; and we bought the bonds of the Government with our State-bank notes freely, until you compelled us, as I have said, under the lead of the Treasury Department, to use them as a basis for our own circulation.

I find, in referring to the speech of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BUNDY,] that he gives a table from the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, from which he finds fault that we of the Eastern States and of New York, and I believe of Pennsylvania and all the Middle States, for we are all in the same category, have more than our share of the currency, while the State of Ohio has in round numbers $1,500,000 less than her quota. Now upon turning to the same report of the Comptroller of the Currency, page 92, I find a list of the national banks that have gone into voluntary liquidation under the provisions of section 42 of the national banking act, and which have voluntarily returned their circulation to the national Treasury for some reason or other. In this list I find nine banks of the State of Ohio, with a circulation of $1,843,940, which have returned all that circulation. It is for that very reason that Ohio has not to-day her quota of the national-bank circulation. If they had not returned it, if they had been able to keep it, they would to-day have had over $300,000 more than their quota of circulation. But having had it—having had the earliest opportunity to organize under the national banking law—what reason is there for those gentlemen coming here to-day and complaining of New England or of the East because we have more than our quota? They once had their full share, or more; but for some reason or other they have not been able to hold it; they have returned it. I think I can explain the reason of this.

They had banks organized in agricultural communities where the banking business would not pay—where better interest could be obtained upon money by investing it in some other way, by lending it on bond and mortgage at 10 or 12 per cent. or putting it into some other form of investment. For that reason they have returned their circulation. Having had it they gave it back, because, I suppose, they could do better with their money.

And so, too, of nearly all the Western States. Five or six appear in this list to have returned their circulation from the State of Illinois; four from the State of Indiana; seven from Wisconsin; five from Missouri; and so on to the end of the chapter. And in all New England, but one little bank in Maine, with only $30,000 capital and $53,000 and a little more of circulation, has voluntarily returned it. But one little bank has failed, and that in my own State, with its capital probably impaired while it was a State-bank institution, if I am not mistaken, and that has paid eighteen cents on the dollar.

Why, Mr. Speaker, banking capital, as well as circulation, in a country like this will, like water, seek its own level. Banking capital will go where it can be made to pay as an investment. Your circulation will go where the wants of business call for it. My friend from Ohio, in alluding to New England as being so well satisfied with her condition in respect to the currency, quoted the well-known words of Job, "Doth the wild ass bray when he hath grass, or loweth the ox over its fodder?" I have shown that his State once had its full share of the fodder; and all I have to say to my friend is that if the ass, having once had its fodder, does not know how to keep it, or cannot keep it, he must be the veriest ass indeed.

The Western States, having once had this banking circulation, have returned it, as I have shown. These instances have occurred all over the West within recent years. These banks have been voluntarily surrendering their circulation, for the reason, I suppose, that the banking business in that section did not require it, and that better use could be made of the money.

Now, Mr. Speaker, while I show here from the report of the Comptroller of the Currency that these States in the West have been voluntarily returning their currency, I will admit that in New York and New England capital has lain idle; there has been money seeking investment; and whenever an opportunity has presented for taking up any of this circulation, I presume that, as far as possible, advantage has been taken of the opportunity. Of late years, however, our banks have been denied the privilege of taking that of other banks, unless they could get it from other banks in their own States when they had more than their quota.

Sir, if my friends from the West want to put more money into a free-banking system I shall be willing to vote with them for a free-banking law properly guarded. I shall be willing, perhaps, to go further and provide that the present requirement with reference to a reserve held by the banks on their circulation shall be modified; for when the banks have a circulation of only 90 per cent. upon bonds which are worth in gold their par face value, I think it perfectly idle and useless to require the banks to keep a reserve for their circulation; but I do not desire any expansion to stimulate speculation and bring worse panics in the future. As I shall not again allude to this subject of the reserve I may as well make one further remark upon it. My friend from Ohio complained last week that the banks are obliged to keep 25 per cent. of their circulation in reserve; but on this point I think he was mistaken. I think that is only the case with the banks of the city of New York, and certain other cities named in the law. Most of the other banks keep a reserve of only 15 per cent., the average being, perhaps, about 20 per cent. for all the banks.

I look upon the requirement with reference to the reserve as no more than well-managed banks will keep without any provision of law, and that is, perhaps, a provision made to be broken in times of panic. It was broken all over the country during the late panic. There was hardly a bank North, South, East, or West that kept its reserve fully up to the legal limit. But in good times I think the safety of a bank in the honest management of its business will undoubtedly induce it to keep as a reserve an amount equal to or greater than the amount now required by law. But this is a matter that can be left to be regulated by the banks themselves.

Mr. PENDLETON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes, sir; if it is not too long.

Mr. PENDLETON. It will occupy but a moment. I wish to ask whether it is not the fact that this reserve is kept for the very purpose of being used by the banks when a panic comes? Does not every bank in such a case use its reserve to pay its depositors? I know that a bank under the law cannot discount while its reserve is below the legal amount; but I assume it has the right to pay out that reserve to depositors.

Mr. KELLOGG. I presume the gentleman is right on that point, but I do not recollect the exact language of the law. And in such a panic as we had last fall, if the banks can save good honest customers who happen to be in a tight place by going still further into the line of their reserve, I think they will consider the law on that point as one made to be broken for the salvation of the business community; precisely as the Bank of England, in a time of panic, suspends specie payments.

Before concluding, I wish to say a few words in regard to the amount of circulation. I do not think the business interests of the country are suffering at this day for want of currency. I think we have as much currency as we ought to have for the legitimate healthful working of industrial pursuits and the different branches of business in this country. My friend from Ohio told us last Saturday (and though I have not examined the figures I presume he is correct) that the circulation of Great Britain is about six hundred millions for thirty-two millions of people; and then by putting the bank capital and the circulation together, he attempted to figure out that there was an enormous disproportion in favor of the people of England per capita as compared with the people of this country.

Well, sir, I care nothing, and your business men care nothing, for any theory based on a comparison with countries a thousand years old, where the commerce of centuries has been pouring the wealth of the world into their lap for hundreds of years, where their flag had carried their commerce to the uttermost ends of the earth before we were known as a nation. And, if they are richer to-day, is it for us who are mere children in age in comparison with them to insist, without regard to the extent of business, that we must have as large a proportionate circulation as theirs? But I call attention, Mr. Speaker, to this fact, that we have a larger circulation to-day than England has, in proportion to our population. But before showing this, as I said at the outset, I am not in favor of contraction. I am not one of those who believe in any violent measures whatever, either of contraction or expansion, for such measures destroy the business of the country. I believe your business men South, North, East, and West, want some stable, permanent business policy. They want to know what you are going to do about it, so that they may calculate their business arrangements for twelve months to come; what contracts they will make, what labor they will hire, what materials they will procure. But so long as you keep them in uncertainty about your legislation, so long as you have forty different schemes before the House, no man knows how to lay out his business for twelve months to come. And this is especially injurious to the laboring classes, for employers will not and cannot lay out their business for the future to give them employment unless they have some stable and settled financial policy upon which they can depend.

I find, Mr. Speaker, in turning to this report of the Comptroller of the Currency, that the whole amount of our bank circulation in 1862, after we had progressed far in the second year of the war; after we had raised armies of several hundred thousand, and every branch of business was stimulated; after all our banks had virtually suspended specie payments and were issuing currency in larger amount than they had ever done before—I find the whole amount of bank circulation at that time, as given on page 11 of the Comptroller's Report for the present year, was only $238,671,210.

A MEMBER. That did not include the Southern States.

Mr. KELLOGG. No, sir; it did not include the Southern States. I admit they had a large currency there; their printing-presses were throwing it off every day as fast as they could print it and find paper. And they carried it just where your greenbacks would go if some of you on this floor had your way, and you added two hundred million or more to the circulation, destroying their value by their volume.

Now I find that, at the present time, taking the last statement of the public debt and the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, we have a bank circulation of $353,968,149; we have of demand and legal-tender notes, $378,481,339.50; of fractional currency, $48,544,792.40; making a total volume of currency of $780,994,380.90, from which I have deducted all the currency there is in the Treasury, being $4,277,851.98, leaving a balance of over $776,000,000. I say, then, without taking time to go into the details, that, comparing the population, comparing the wealth shown by the last census and that of 1860, and allowing a proportional increase, with the wealth and population as they were in 1862, and considering that we are now in a time of peace and were then in a time of war, raising armies by the hundred thousand, and building ships, monitors, and everything of that kind, I say we have a larger pro rata circulation to-day than we had during that second year of the war; and I say that that appears from the figures given by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BUNDY] in his speech last Saturday.

Now, Mr. Speaker, before closing I will allude to my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] and the theory he has advocated here of his 3.65 convertible bonds. I know the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania has given much study to the theory that he has presented; and I admire always the zeal and the energy with which he works at any subject he undertakes. But the plan he has brought before this House and this country looks to me like pure and simple inflation. It looks to me as an engine which bankers and lockers-up of currency in New York City would use for worse lock-ups and worse panics than we have so lately experienced.

But I will not spend much time upon that theory to-day. It is well perhaps not to spend too much time on it now; for it is too far gone in its present condition, being almost in extremis; and the old maxim "de mortuis nil nisi bonum" is a generous and excellent one for the dying as well as the dead. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania can resurrect it in this House, if he can again breathe the breath of life into his scheme, which has been brought back here by the feet from the doors of two of its leading committees, and now lies here stark and cold and lifeless, then by and by we will have more to say on that subject. I shall have a blow or two to give it then, if I have opportunity; but I pass it by now with head uncovered and in silence. I will only say now that I look upon that scheme, as I look upon every one of these plans advanced here for the expansion of the currency, as something that will prove ruinous and disastrous to your business, West and East.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this Congress ought not to adjourn its present session without taking some decisive, onward, and forward step for the resumption of specie payments. I am not one of those who believe that for Congress to say "specie payment" will bring it. I do not believe that an act of Congress, legislating the resumption of specie payment this day or the next or the next, will bring it. I think such legislation would do what the report of the then chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, during the war, did for gold—when, you remember, under the whip and spur of the previous question he put through a bill one day that after a certain time it should be a misdemeanor, and punishable with severe penalties, to speculate in gold in the city of New York above a certain rate. You will remember, also, that gold went up as soon as that law passed, kiting, kiting, almost out of sight; and Congress was forced to repeal that law within a week.

No, gentlemen, we cannot by any decree of ours say that specie payment shall be or can be resumed any sooner than the business interests of the country will bring us to it; but I believe we can do one thing—we can take a step forward in that direction. For that reason I am willing to go for a free-banking law, guarded by proper restrictions. Let gentlemen of the South and West have all the banks they want, if they have the money to organize them and their business demands them; but as I have said already, many of these States have returned the banking circulation they already had taken, and they will not take it any faster than the business of the country requires it. Why, gentlemen, you have had free banking for four years past. Four years ago we passed a law providing for the issue of $54,000,000 of currency, and that it should be allotted to your States; that we of the East should have none of it; and that when that was all gone $25,000,000 more should be taken from us and given to you. Why have you not had it? Because during the four years your business has offered no inducement to capitalists to take up the $54,000,000, and it was not taken up in December last. I believe that it has been substantially taken up now. If, however, you want more circulation, I should be disposed to give you a free-banking law; but I would couple with it a provision that as fast as you increase the volume of circulation by free-bank notes, the Secretary of the Treasury shall retire an equal amount of greenbacks. And when you get the amount of greenbacks down to $200,000,000 the Government by and by can resume specie payments, and your bank-notes will be worth the value on their face. You have got to bring the Government to a position to resume first; and it is the duty of this Congress, here and now, to take the first step towards specie payments; to take it in a manner not to be mistaken, and to take no step backward on this subject.

Sir, this is no party question. I would scorn politics in a matter that concerns the business welfare of all my constituents, without distinction of party, and a question that concerns the best interests of all the people of the whole country, for whom we legislate here. But if I were to talk to my friends on the republican side of the House, I would say to them that we are pledged by our platforms of 1868 and 1872, if we are pledged to anything, to a return to specie payments. You declared that you would do it at Chicago in 1868, and would pay your whole debt in coin when not otherwise provided; and your President, in addressing the people from the portico of this Capitol on the 4th of March following, repeated the pledge. The first law you passed was a renewal of that pledge. You put it again in your platform of 1872; and it is now too late for you to go back from that pledge, and say that greenbacks are good enough currency for all time, and that we never want to come back to specie payments.

Senator SHERMAN says that when we get down to $300,000,000 of greenbacks we can come to specie payment; but I think his amount too large. Yet if we allow more bank-note circulation and take up greenbacks in their stead, when we get down to $150,000,000 or $200,000,000 the Government then can resume specie payment; and the Government must be the first to do it. The gold in the country will then be added to the volume of currency, if you need inflation by that time. Our bank-notes will be so good that nobody will want them redeemed in gold, for they are secured by bonds of the Government worth more than their face in gold.

I believe, when you have assured the country that your policy is one tending to specie payments, you will have placed the country on the basis of a sound, permanent, and lasting prosperity.

I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

REPLY TO THE NATIONAL BOARD OF TRADE.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Connecticut, [Mr. KELLOGG,] for whose courtesy I am grateful, may save his sympathy for my currency bill. Had I been permitted to have a vote on the question of referring it to the Committee of the Whole, to which it was sent on a point of order, he would have found it just the most vital and the liveliest corpse his eyes have ever beheld, and I apprehend that when the question comes, what bill shall be discussed in Committee of the Whole, he will find that a majority of the House cannot be trammeled by the report of any committee or committees.

We have been instructed, Mr. Speaker, by the National Board of Trade, which was recently in session at Baltimore; and that learned body, not content with indoctrinating us through its speeches and resolutions, sent its venerable president, my friend from childhood, Frederick Frailey, esq., of Philadelphia, to tell the Committee on Banking and Currency what it ought to do, and what the House must do, in order to merit the good opinion of that enlightened and influential body.

Sir, boards of trade have, as I shall show you, been in the habit of assuming to guide legislation for more than a century, and I think the controlling spirits of our National Board of Trade must be lineal descendants of the board of trade of Great Britain of 1764, one hundred and ten years ago. Their resolutions vindicate their genealogy. They have inherited all the mental and moral idiosyncrasies that characterized the board of trade that was presided over by Lord Hillhouse, and will probably, as he was a noble lord, not object to my attributing such a descent to them. They have the same intense regard for the creditor class, and would increase the value of the money in which it is to receive payment of obligations contracted under an expanded currency. They have also the same sublime disregard for the debtor class and for the laboring community. They care not how much these suffer, in order that creditors may be paid in money of abundant and increasing value.

I will not undertake to answer this learned and disinterested body, composed, as it was, largely of stockholders and officers of national banks. I will allow one to reply to them whose name is known to all, and whom all regard as having been a patriot in his day, and a philosopher for all time.

On the 9th of February, 1764, the British board of trade made a report, in which, speaking of paper money as legal-tender, they asserted, first, "that it carries the gold and silver out of the province, and so ruins the country, as experience has shown in every Colony where it has been practiced in any great degree;" secondly, "that the merchants trading to America have suffered and lost by it;" thirdly, "that the restriction of it has had a beneficial effect in New England;" fourthly, "that every medium of trade should have an intrinsic value, which paper money has not—gold and silver coin are therefore the fittest for this medium, as they are an equivalent, which paper never can be;" fifthly, "that debtors in the Assemblies make paper money with fraudulent views;" sixthly, "that in the Middle Colonies, where the credit of the paper money has been best supported, the bills have never kept to their nominal value in circulation, but have constantly depreciated to a certain degree whenever the quantity has been increased."

You see that the British board of trade in 1764 raised for consideration precisely the questions which the National Board of Trade present to us. And by whom were they answered? By one Benjamin Franklin, printer, who, having recently returned from London, was administering the post-office system as Postmaster-General; and I invoke him to reply to our board of trade. In the fourth volume of Franklin's Works, Duane's edition, published in 1809, on page 182, we find a paper on paper money, entitled "Remarks and Facts relative to the American Paper Money." I will read only a brief extract or two, having furnished a copy to the reporters, which will appear in the RECORD.

[After reading for a time, including the following:]

The fourth reason is: "That every medium of trade should have an intrinsic value, which paper money has not. Gold and silver are therefore the fittest for this medium, as they are an equivalent, which paper never can be." However fit a particular thing may be for a particular purpose, wherever that thing is not to be had, or not to be had in sufficient quantity, it becomes necessary to use something else—the fittest that can be got—in lieu of it. Gold and silver are not the produce of North America, which has no mines; and that which is brought thither cannot be kept there in sufficient quantity for a currency.

Now, sir, notwithstanding the extension of our country our condition is identical with that of the Colonies then. It is true that we have the richest mines of gold and silver in the world. But we cannot keep their products. And why? Because we have gone blindly on issuing gold-bearing bonds, until we owe, annually, not only the entire product of our mines, but 66 per cent. more than the total annual product. Owing $100,000,000 annual interest on our bonded debt in 1874, we are in precisely the same condition, by reason of our gold-bearing bonded indebtedness, that our colonial ancestors were when Franklin truly said they were without mines of gold.

Mr. BECK. How old did the gentleman say that book was?

Mr. KELLEY. I have quoted what Benjamin Franklin wrote in 1764.

Mr. BECK. I understood the gentleman to say that he would print the book in the RECORD, but would read a little of it now.

Mr. KELLEY. I did not hear the gentleman exactly.

Mr. BECK. I understood you to say that you would read a little from the book, and print the balance in the RECORD.

Mr. KELLEY. I will print, not the whole book, but——

Mr. BECK. O, yes; print it all.

Mr. KELLEY. I will print Franklin's paper, showing that he understood vastly more of the laws of commerce and currency in those provincial days that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] does to-day, with all the intervening experience before him. And with this remark, I will hand the book to the reporters.

Mr. BECK. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] would not know much if he did not know more than I do after listening to him for four days in committee and three Saturdays in the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. KELLEY. Four days! Now, BECK, you know very well that you consumed two of them yourself with irrelevant questions and crude and unconsidered suggestions. [Great laughter.]

The following is the paper referred to by Mr. KELLEY in his remarks:

REMARKS AND FACTS RELATIVE TO THE AMERICAN PAPER MONEY.

In the report of the board of trade, dated February 9, 1764, the following reasons are given for restraining the emission of paper bills of credit in America as a legal tender:

First. That it carries the gold and silver out of the province, and so ruins the country, as experience has shown in every Colony where it has been practiced in any great degree.

Secondly. That the merchants trading to America have suffered and lost by it.

Thirdly. That the restriction of it has had a beneficial effect in New England.

Fourthly. That every medium of trade should have an intrinsic value, which paper money has not. Gold and silver are therefore the fittest for this medium, as they are an equivalent, which paper never can be.

Fifthly. That debtors in the Assemblies make paper money with fraudulent views.

Sixthly. That in the Middle Colonies, where the credit of the paper money has been best supported, the bills have never kept to their nominal value in circulation, but have constantly depreciated to a certain degree whenever the quantity has been increased.

To consider these reasons in their order: the first is—

First. "That paper money carries the gold and silver out of the province, and so ruins the country, as experience has shown in every Colony where it has been practiced in any great degree." This opinion of its ruining the country seems to be merely speculative, or not otherwise founded than upon misinformation in the matter of fact. The truth is that, the balance of their trade with Britain being greatly against them, the gold and silver are drawn out to pay that balance; and then the necessity of some medium of trade has induced the making of paper money, which could not be carried away. Thus if carrying out all the gold and silver ruins a country, every Colony was ruined before it made paper money. But, far from being ruined by it, the Colonies that have made use of paper money have been, and are, all in a thriving condition. The debt indeed to Britain has increased, because their numbers, and of course their trade, have increased; for all trade having always a proportion of debt outstanding, which is paid in its turn, while fresh debt is contracted, the proportion of debt naturally increases as the trade increases; but the improvement and increase of the estates in the Colonies have been in a greater proportion than their debt. New England, particularly in 1696, (about the time they began the use of paper money,) had in all its four provinces but one hundred and thirty churches or congregations; in 1760 they were five hundred and thirty. The number of farms and buildings there is increased in proportion to the numbers of people, and the goods exported to them from England in 1750, before the restraint took place, were near five times as much as before they had paper money. Pennsylvania, before it made any paper money, was totally stripped of its gold and silver, though they had from time to time, like the neighboring Colonies, agreed to take gold and silver coins at higher nominal values, in hopes of drawing money into, and retaining it for the internal uses of the province. During that weak practice silver got up by degrees to eight shillings and nine pence per ounce, and English crowns were called six, seven, and eight shilling pieces long before paper money was made. But this practice of increasing the denomination was found not to answer the end. The balance of trade carried out the gold and silver as fast as they were brought in, the merchants raising the price of their goods in proportion to the increased denomination of the money. The difficulties for want of cash were accordingly very great, the chief part of the trade being carried on by the extremely inconvenient method of barter; when in 1723 paper money was first made there, which gave new life to business, promoted greatly the settlement of new lands, (by lending small sums to beginners on easy interest, to be repaid by installments,) whereby the province has so greatly increased in inhabitants that the export from hence thither is now more than tenfold what it then was; and by their trade with foreign colonies they have been able to obtain great quantities of gold and silver to remit hither in return for the manufactures of this country. New York and New Jersey have also increased greatly during the same period with the use of paper money; so that it does not appear to be of the ruinous nature ascribed to it. And if the inhabitants of those countries are glad to have the use of paper among themselves that they may thereby be enabled to spare for remittances hither the gold and silver they obtain by their commerce with foreigners, one would expect that no objection against their parting with it could arise here in the country that receives it.

The second reason is: "That the merchants trading to America have suffered and lost by the paper money." This may have been the case in particular instances, at particular times and places, as in South Carolina about fifty-eight years since, when the Colony was thought in danger of being destroyed by the Indians and Spaniards, and the British merchants, in fear of losing their whole effects there, called precipitately for remittances, and the inhabitants, to get something lodged in safe countries, gave any price in paper money for bills of exchange, whereby the paper, as compared with bills or with produce or other effects fit for exportation, was suddenly and greatly depreciated. The unsettled state of government for a long time in that province had also its share in depreciating its bills; but since that danger blew over, and the Colony has been in the hands of the Crown, their currency became fixed, and has so remained to this day. Also, in New England, when much greater quantities were issued than were necessary for a medium of trade, to defray the expedition against Louisburgh, and during the last war in Virginia and North Carolina, when great sums were issued to pay the Colony troops, and the war made tobacco a poorer remittance, from the higher price of freight and insurance; in these cases the merchants trading to those Colonies may sometimes have suffered by the sudden and unforeseen rise of exchange. By slow and gradual rise they seldom suffer, the goods being sold at proportionable prices. But war is a common calamity in all countries, and the merchants that deal with them cannot expect to avoid a share of the losses it sometimes occasions by affecting public credit. It is hoped, however, that the profits of their subsequent commerce with those Colonies may have made them some reparation. And the merchants trading to the Middle Colonies (New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania) have never suffered by any rise of exchange, it having ever been a constant rule there to consider British debts as payable in Britain, and not to be discharged but by as much paper—whatever might be the rate of exchange—as would purchase a bill for the full sterling sum. On the contrary, the merchants have been great gainers by the use of paper money in those Colonies, as it enabled them to send much greater quantities of goods, and the purchasers to pay more punctually for them. And the people there make no complaint of any injury done them by paper money, with a legal tender; they are sensible of its benefits, and petition to have it so allowed.

The third reason is: "That the restriction has had a beneficial effect in New England." Particular circumstances in the New England Colonies made paper money less necessary and less convenient to them. They have great and valuable fisheries of whale and cod, by which large remittances can be made. They are four distinct governments, but having much mutual intercourse of dealings, the money of each used to pass current in all; but the whole of this common currency not being under one common direction was not so easily kept within due bounds; the prudent reserve of one Colony in its emissions being rendered useless by excess in another. Those in Massachusetts therefore were not dissatisfied with the restraint, as it restrained their neighbors as well as themselves; and perhaps they do not desire to have the act repealed. They have not yet felt much inconvenience from it, as they were enabled to abolish their paper currency by a large sum in silver, from Britain, to reimburse their expenses in taking Louisburgh which, with the gold brought from Portugal, by means of their fish, kept them supplied with a currency till the late war furnished them and all America with bills of exchange; so that little cash was needed for remittance. Their fisheries, too, furnish them with remittances through Spain and Portugal to England; which enables them the more easily to retain gold and silver in their country. The Middle Colonies have not this advantage, nor have they tobacco, which in Virginia and Maryland answers the same purpose. When Colonies are so different in their circumstances, a regulation that is not inconvenient to one or a few may be very much as to the rest. But the pay is now become so indifferent in New England, at least in some of its provinces, through the want of currency, that the trade thither is at present under great discouragement.

The fourth reason is: "That every medium of trade should have an intrinsic value, which paper money has not. Gold and silver are therefore the fittest for this medium, as they are an equivalent, which paper never can be." However fit a particular thing may be for a particular purpose, wherever that thing is not to be had, or not to be had in sufficient quantity, it becomes necessary to use something else, the fittest that can be got in lieu of it. Gold and silver are not the produce of North America, which has no mines; and that which is brought thither cannot be kept there in sufficient quantity for a currency. Britain, an independent, great state, when its inhabitants grow too fond of expensive luxuries of foreign countries, that draw away its money, can, and frequently does, make laws to discourage or prohibit such importations; and by that means can retain its cash. The Colonies are dependent governments, and their people, having naturally great respect for the sovereign country, and being thence immoderately fond of its modes, manufactures, and superfluities, cannot be restrained from purchasing them by any province law; because such law, if made, would immediately be repealed here, as prejudicial to the trade and interest of Britain. It seems hard, therefore, to draw all their real money from them, and then refuse them the poor privilege of using paper instead of it. Bank-bills and bankers' notes are daily used here as a medium of trade, and in large dealings perhaps the greater part is transacted by their means; and yet they have no intrinsic value, but rest on the credit of those that issued them; as paper bills in the Colonies do on the credit of the respective governments there. Their being payable in cash upon sight by the drawer is indeed a circumstance that cannot attend the Colony bills, for the reason just above mentioned, their cash being drawn from them by the British trade; but the legal-tender being substituted in its place is rather a greater advantage to the possessor, since he need not be at the trouble of going to a particular bank or banker to demand the money, finding (wherever he has occasion to lay out money in the province) a person that is obliged to take the bills. So that even out of the province, the knowledge that every man within that province is obliged to take its money, gives the bills credit among its neighbors, nearly equal to what they have at home.

And were it not for the laws here that restrain or prohibit as much as possible all losing trades the cash of this country would soon be exported; every merchant who had occasion to remit it would run to the bank with all its bills that came into his hands and take out his part of its treasure for that purpose; so that in a short time it would be no more able to pay bills in money upon sight than it is now in the power of a Colony treasury so to do. And if government afterward should have occasion for the credit of the bank, it must of necessity make its bills a legal tender; funding them, however, on taxes by which they may in time be paid off, as has been the general practice in the Colonies. At this very time even the silver money in England is obliged to the legal tender for part of its value; that part which is the difference between its real weight and its denomination. Great part of the shillings and sixpences now current are by wearing become 5, 10, 20, and some of the sixpences even 50 per cent. too light. For this difference between the real and the nominal you have no intrinsic value; you have not so much as paper; you have nothing. It is the legal tender, with the knowledge that it can easily be repassed for the same value, that makes threepennyworth of silver pass for sixpence. Gold and silver have undoubtedly some properties that give them a fitness above paper, as a medium of exchange; particularly their universal estimation; especially in cases where a country has occasion to carry its money abroad, either as a stock to trade with, or to purchase allies and foreign succors. Otherwise, that very universal estimation is an inconvenience, which paper money is free from; since it tends to deprive a country of even the quantity of currency that should be retained as a necessary instrument of its internal commerce, and obliges it to be continually on its guard in making and executing at a great expense the laws that are to prevent the trade which exports it. Paper money well funded has another great advantage over gold and silver—its lightness of carriage and the little room that is occupied by a great sum, whereby it is capable of being more easily and more safely, because more privately, conveyed from place to place. Gold and silver are not intrinsically of equal value with iron, a metal in itself capable of many more benefits to mankind. Their value rests chiefly in the estimation they happen to be in among the generality of nations and the credit given to the opinion that that estimation will continue. Otherwise, a pound of gold would not be a real equivalent for even a bushel of wheat. Any other well-founded credit is as much an equivalent as gold and silver; and in some cases more so, or it would not be preferred by commercial people in different countries. Not to mention again our own bank-bills, Holland, which understands the value of cash as well as any people in the world, would never part with gold and silver for credit, (as they do when they put it into their bank, whence little ever is afterward drawn out,) if they did not think and find the credit a full equivalent.

The fifth reason is: "That debtors in the Assemblies make paper money with fraudulent views." This is often said by the adversaries of paper money, and if it has been the case in any particular Colony, that Colony should, on proof of the fact, be duly punished. This, however, would be no reason for punishing other Colonies, who have not so abused their legislative powers—to deprive all the Colonies of the convenience of paper money because it has been charged on some of them that they have made it an instrument of fraud, as if all the India, bank, and other stocks and trading companies were to be abolished, because there have been, once in an age, Mississippi and South Sea schemes and bubbles.

The sixth and last reason is: "That in the Middle Colonies, where the paper money has been best supported, the bills have never kept to their nominal value in circulation, but have constantly depreciated to a certain degree whenever the quantity has been increased." If the rising of the value of any particular commodity wanted for exportation is to be considered as a depreciation of the values of whatever remains in the country, then the rising of silver above paper to that height of additional value which its capability of exportation only gave it may be called a depreciation of the paper. Even here, as bullion has been wanted or not wanted for exportation, its price has raised from 5*s*. 2*d*. to 5*s*. 8*d*. per ounce. This is near 10 per cent. But was it ever said or thought on such an occasion that all the bank-bills, and all the coined silver, and all the gold in the kingdom were depreciated 10 per cent.? Coined silver is now wanted here for change, and 1 per cent. is given for it by some bankers. Are gold and bank notes therefore depreciated 1 per cent.? The fact in the Middle Colonies is really this: On the emission of the first paper money, a difference soon arose between that and silver, the latter having a property the former had not, a property always in demand in the colonies, to wit, its being fit for a remittance. This property having soon found its value by the merchants bidding on one another for it, and a dollar thereby coming to be rated at 8*s*. in paper money of New York, and 7*s*. 6*d*. in paper of Pennsylvania, it has continued uniformly at those rates in both provinces now nearly forty years, without any variation upon new emissions, though in Pennsylvania the paper currency has at times increased from £15,000, the first sum, to £600,000 or near it. Nor has any alteration been occasioned by the paper money in the price of the necessaries of life, when compared with silver. They have been for the greatest part of the time no higher than before it was emitted, varying only by plenty and scarcity, or by a less or greater foreign demand.

It has, indeed, been usual with the adversaries of a paper currency to call every rise of exchange with London a depreciation of the paper; but this notion appears to be by no means just; for if the paper purchases everything but bills of exchange at the former rate, and these bills are not above one-tenth of what is employed in purchases, then it may be more properly and truly said that the exchange has risen than that the paper has depreciated. And as a proof of this, it is a certain fact that whenever in those colonies bills of exchange have been cleared, the purchaser has been constantly obliged to give more in silver, as well as in paper, for them, the silver having gone hand in hand with the paper at the rate above mentioned; and therefore it might as well have been said that the silver was depreciated.

There have been several different schemes for furnishing the Colonies with paper money that should not be a legal tender, namely:

1. To form a bank in imitation of the Bank of England, with a sufficient stock of cash to pay the bills on sight.

This has been often proposed, but appears impracticable under the present circumstances of the Colony trade, which, as is said above, draws all the cash to Britain, and would soon strip the bank.

2. To raise a fund by some yearly tax, securely lodged in the Bank of England as it arises, which should (during the term of years for which the paper bills are to be current) accumulate to a sum sufficient to discharge them all at their original value.

This has been tried in Maryland, and the bills so funded were issued without being made a general legal tender. The event was, that as notes payable in time are naturally subject to a discount proportioned to the time, so these bills fell, at the beginning of the term, so low as that twenty pounds of them became worth no more than twelve pounds in Pennsylvania, the next neighboring province, though both had been struck near the same time, at the same nominal value, but the latter was supported by the general legal tender. The Maryland bills, however, began to rise as the term shortened, and toward the end recovered their full value. But as a depreciating currency injures creditors, this injured debtors, and, by its continually changing value, appears unfit for the purpose of money, which should be as fixed as possible in its own value, because it is to be the measure of the value of other things.

3. To make the bills carry an interest sufficient to support their value.

This, too, has been tried in some of the New England Colonies, but great inconveniences were found to attend it. The bills, to fit them for a currency, are made of various denominations, and some very low, for the sake of change; they are of from £10 down to 3*d*. When they first come abroad they pass easily and answer the purpose well enough for a few months; but as soon as the interest becomes worth computing, the calculation of it on every little bill in a sum between the dealer and his customers, in shops, warehouses, and markets, takes up much time, to the great hinderance of business. This evil, however, soon gave place to a worse, for the bills were in a short time gathered up and hoarded, it being a very tempting advantage to have money bearing interest and the principal all the while in a man's power, ready for bargains that may offer, which money out on mortgage is not. By this means numbers of people became usurers with small sums, who could not have found persons to take such sums of them upon interest, giving good security, and would therefore not have thought of it, but would rather have employed the money in some business, if it had been money of the common kind. Thus trade, instead of being increased by such bills, is diminished; and by their being shut up in chests, the very end of making them, namely, to furnish a medium of commerce, is in a great measure, if not totally defeated.

On the whole, no method has hitherto been formed to establish a medium of trade in lieu of money equal in all its advantages to bills of credit, funded on sufficient taxes for discharging it, or on land security of double the value for repaying it at the end of the term, and in the mean time made a general legal tender.

Mr. KELLOGG. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. LOUGHRIDGE.]

RETRENCHMENT.

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the House to the necessity of economy and retrenchment in the present condition of the finances of the country.

Upon meeting together at the first session of this Congress we are brought face to face with this state of facts: Our expenditures are in excess of our revenues. Taking, this year, the deficiencies coming over from the last year, and the estimates of the revenue and expenditures for the next fiscal year, and the proposed expenditures will exceed the revenues by some twenty-five or thirty millions.

It is for this Congress to decide what shall be done in this emergency. The Government must not become insolvent; it must not go to protest. We will all agree that every legal claim, when due and presented, must be paid.

There are, then, three courses open to us—either to borrow money to pay the expenses of the Government, or to impose upon the country additional taxation, or to cut down the expenditures to such an extent as that they shall come within the ordinary revenues of the Government, as the laws now stand.

As to the first of these plans, I consider that, with our present revenue, it would be a lasting disgrace to the party in power that it should be driven to the necessity of borrowing money to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government in times of peace; and, for one, I cannot consent to it.

As to the increase of taxation, I am utterly opposed to adding one cent to the heavy burdens now upon the shoulders of the people. To do so would, in my opinion, be a political crime, which should consign those responsible for it to political oblivion.

Why, sir, it has already been proposed upon this floor to increase taxation by imposing a tariff upon tea and coffee. Against this, or any similar proposition, I enter my most earnest protest. And I desire here to say, in explanation of my having at this session introduced a bill to impose a tax upon incomes of over $3,000 per annum, that, while I am opposed to any increase of taxation, and think it unnecessary, yet, if there must be an increase, I prefer that such increase should come from the surplus wealth of the country, instead of from the labor of the country; should be gathered from the overflowing treasuries of the wealthy and the prosperous, rather than from the breakfast tables of the poor.

But I do not desire now to enter into a discussion of the true theory of taxation. My purpose at this time is to urge the importance of avoiding all increase of taxation, and to point out the true way to this end.

Taxation is necessary to support governments, and the people cannot avoid it; but excessive taxation is a great calamity to a people—one of the greatest that can befall any country. It binds grievous burdens upon labor; discourages the laboring classes, consigning them to lives of hopeless and illy requited toil; cripples industries; and paralyzes the energies of the nation.

The burdens of taxation are felt more severely by the laboring classes than by the wealthy, for it is doubtless true that in the end the tax is mostly paid by the producer. The great mass of the people of this country live by their own labor. The number of those who have incomes to support them, independently of their daily labor, is small compared with those who are dependent upon their daily labor for their subsistence; and it is the duty of a government to guard well the interests and the rights of labor, and, above all other things, to protect it against excessive taxation, for there is no doubt of the truth of the statement that the capital, the aggregated wealth of the country, can better endure the burdens of additional taxation than can the labor of the country. And, in behalf of the interests of all the people, of all classes, I insist that there shall be no increase of taxation.

There is in my mind no doubt of the fact that the present revenues of the Government are more than is necessary for the support of the Government conducted with a proper degree of economy. I apprehend, sir, that the principles which apply to men in the management of private business apply equally to the management of the financial affairs of a government; and one of the well-understood maxims of business, recognized as true the world over, is, that "economy is absolutely necessary to financial success and prosperity." A man must spend less than he makes. Franklin said, "If you know how to spend less than you get you have the philosopher's stone." Cicero said, "Economy is itself a great revenue." And the experience and observation of every gentleman upon this floor will add to the testimony of the truth of this maxim. The want of economy has made wreck of many a private fortune, and the want of it will as surely bankrupt a nation.

And in view of this necessity, speaking for myself, animated by a sense of duty to the country, my motto and watchword shall be "Retrenchment and reform." I have enlisted under that flag, and shall there remain so long as I have the honor to occupy a seat upon this floor as a Representative of the people. And, speaking for the Committee on Appropriations, which has a great responsibility in this direction, I can say that that committee is laboring faithfully and earnestly to reduce the expenditures to the lowest possible figure consistent with the good of the public service, as I think their bills already brought into the House fully show. All that we ask is that the House sustain us, as far as we properly go in the direction of retrenchment.

Retrenchment should not be confined to any one department; it should be applied to all. We have commenced in the right place; where all reform should commence—at home. We have cut down our own salaries, and now we should go through the whole list, and wherever the pruning-knife can be applied properly and justly apply it. This is what is demanded by the present condition of the country; it is what is demanded by the people from Maine to California, and when I say "demanded," I mean what I say. The people were never more in earnest than they are upon this question, and they are watching this Congress closely.

A partial and temporary retrenchment will not satisfy the people; it must be a system extending into every department, thoroughly scrutinizing all expenditures, great and small, cutting down and cutting out wherever it can be done; an economy radical, thorough, and severe; just such economy as a citizen would exercise in his own private affairs, if he found that his expenses were exceeding his income and insolvency staring him in the face.

Every member of this House is in favor of economy, and cutting down the expenditures; but the difficulty is that there are so many gentlemen who think that the economy should be applied in some other place than in the place or department which happens to be at the time under consideration, and where the knife is about to be applied.

When the Navy bill was before the House—having been reduced by the Appropriation Committee between two and three million dollars below the estimates, and some three millions below the expenditures of last year—we found quite a number of the members of the Naval Committee ready to fight against the proposed reductions there; all of them, of course, in favor of economy, but in favor of it in some other place than in the Naval Department.

So with the bill making appropriations for the War Department, now pending in the House. The Committee on Appropriations deemed it proper to cut down the expenses of the Army, believing that the expenses of the military establishment in these times of peace is greater than necessary, and greater than the people desire; and the bill was framed with a view to a decrease of the expense, the revised estimate of the Secretary of War being $32,708,716, and the bill introduced being $28,500,000, a cutting down of $4,200,000. And no sooner is this bill before the House than it is assailed by several leading members of the Committee on Military Affairs. Those gentlemen are all in favor, earnestly in favor, of economy; but the cutting down must be some other place than in the Army—that cannot be touched.

The gentleman from Connecticut, a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, eloquently resists the reduction of the Army as proposed by that bill, and objects to it because the officers are not reduced as well as the rank and file. This is true; but that gentleman well knows that the Committee on Appropriations has no jurisdiction or power to change the law so as to reduce the officers. That is the province of the committee of which that gentleman is a member; and if his committee will bring in such a bill, I doubt not he will have the cordial support of every member of the Committee on Appropriations.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, of the Committee on Military Affairs, also opposes entirely the reduction of the Army in any respect. He paints in eloquent language the injustice of mustering out any of the officers of the regular Army. Speaking of the officers, he said:

> They are compelled to live in remote parts of the country, deprived of the society of the refined and cultured—often away from their friends and families—for years, with barely sufficient to keep them.

And yet, to permit these officers to leave the hard and self-denying service described by the gentleman and return to their homes, and remain in the society of the "refined and cultured" and with their wives and families, would be, in the opinion of that gentleman, a great outrage and wrong. And why? Because the gentleman intimates the officers are incapacitated from obtaining their living in any other way.

Sir, as a friend of the Army officers of this country I repudiate any such idea; I have a higher estimate of the manhood of the men who compose the list of officers of the Army of the United States. There is no more worthy, able, cultivated, and educated class of men in this country than the officers of the regular Army. The great majority of them are young, energetic, active, and able-bodied men; and I would not do them the injustice to believe that they are incapable, as a class, of obtaining a livelihood outside of the Army, if thrown upon their own resources. No man respects the officers of the Army more than I do; no man more than I would dislike to do them injustice; but if the interests of our common country require a reduction in the Army, I have the confidence in them to believe that they would yield cheerfully to the necessity.

Nor do I believe, sir, that a return to private life for a season would injure their efficiency as officers. On the contrary, I believe that it would be rather a benefit. The great chieftain of our armies in the late war against the rebellion, as we all know, left the Army and lived for years in private life, supporting himself and his family by his own exertions; and when the tocsin of war sounded re-entered the Army with renewed strength and vigor of manhood, made stronger by contact with the business of life, and none the less a soldier by his absence from the Army. No, sir; I believe it to be a mistake that a return for a season to private life impairs the effectiveness of an officer of the Army. I believe the reverse to be the truth.

The gentleman rehearses the hard service performed heretofore by the officers of the Army, on the march, in battle, and in camp, and complains of the injustice of throwing them upon their own resources after their faithful service. Sir, I admit their service, their fidelity, and their worth. I go as far as the gentleman in giving them the meed of praise to which they are entitled, those of them who have seen service, as most of them have; but, sir, I must recollect, and the gentleman knows, that there are millions of men all over the country who left their homes and families as he did, and spent long years in the service of their country, and who, when they had sustained the flag and the authority of the Government, laid aside their arms, were mustered out—thousands of them desiring to remain in the Army—and who are now in the field, the mine, the workshop, and in all the many avocations of private life, toiling manfully to support themselves and their families; and that those millions are the tax-payers who support the Government, and that they have rights and interests as well as those who are still in the Army; that those men are also undergoing hardship and toil, and many of them want and privation; their hands hardened by toil, their cheeks bronzed by summer suns, and their faces hardened by winter storms. For those veterans of the Army and sons of toil I insist upon retrenchment, even if a decrease of the Army is a consequence.

Another illustration of the fact that it is hard for the House to agree upon any line of retrenchment is the action of the House upon the bill reported by the Committee on Appropriations on Tuesday last, which had been prepared by the committee with great care, and after consultation with the Secretary of the Treasury and the Government architect.

The object of the committee in preparing that bill was to have both Houses declare (if they thought it wise to do so) that the public buildings which had been authorized, but which had not been commenced, should not be commenced at present, but should be postponed until a future season when the country is better able to build them.

The attention of Congress was called to this subject of public buildings by the President in his message at the opening of this session, in the following words:

> I commend to Congress such economy, and point out two sources where it seems to me it might commence, to wit, in the appropriations for public buildings in the many cities where work has not yet been commenced.

The President regarded this matter of public buildings, and the harbors and fortifications, as the two most likely and favorable fields for retrenchment.

The Secretary of the Treasury also, in his report, pointed this out as one of the first places to exercise economy and apply the pruning knife; he uses the following language:

> In the annual report of the Secretary for 1872, the attention of Congress was called to the fact that large sums of money would be needed for the completion of buildings begun and authorized, and it was recommended that no new buildings should be authorized, Contrary to this recommendation Congress authorized the commencement of seventeen new buildings and the purchase of sites for several others. This legislation has rendered it necessary to submit estimates, in an aggregate sum much larger, I think, than should be expended in any one year.

The Secretary of the Treasury then also recommended this Department as a good field for economy.

The Committee on Appropriations then, through the House, called upon the Secretary for information as to the public buildings, and the following tables, No. 1 and No. 2, were furnished.

These tables thus show that to take no steps to commence the buildings authorized but not yet commenced, and no contract made, would enable us to reduce the appropriations for next year $950,000, and to cover into the Treasury $1,270,000 already appropriated last Congress, making a saving of $2,220,000. And of the buildings in Table No. 2 about $4,000,000 could be saved, without any detriment or loss to the Government.

I confess, sir, that I was surprised at the opposition which the introduction of that bill roused in the House, and at the disposition made of it by the House; and I confess further that I was much discouraged by the result of that effort on the part of the Committee on Appropriations to carry out the recommendation of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, and put a stop to the expenditure of money where it could be done without detriment to the public service.

The bill was taken from the Committee on Appropriations and sent to another committee, for what reason it is not for me to say; but the record shows that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who was one of the most active in that disposition of the bill, spoke as follows just as the vote was being taken. I read from the RECORD:

Mr. NEGLEY. But if referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, that is the end of it.

It may, sir, be the end of that particular bill, but I trust it is not the end of all attempts to stop a reckless and extravagant expenditure.

If the party in power and having control of all the departments of the Government will take this position and carry it out honestly and thoroughly, it will have the confidence and the support of the people. If those who manage and control its councils shall lack the nerve or the will to take this course, then the days of its power are numbered, and some other organization more in accord with the people will take its place and assume control of the Government.

It would seem, Mr. Speaker, that it should be unnecessary for any one to urge the duty of economy in the expenditure of the money wrung by taxation from the toiling millions of the land. Let the Representatives of the people upon this floor go back in mind to their constituencies, to their homes and their firesides; let them reflect upon the want and the privation suffered by so many; let them think of the struggling poor who can scarcely obtain the necessaries of life; let them bring to mind the sons of toil in the fields, the mines, and the workshops, struggling to support themselves and those dependent upon them, and to keep the wolf from their doors; let them think of the tens of thousands who are suffering for the comforts of life—let the Representatives of the people think of these things, and it seems to me that no further incentive should be required to induce the exercise of the most severe economy in the expenditure of the people's money, so as to avoid taxation. I repeat what I have before said upon this floor, that it is much easier for us, sitting in these easy-chairs, to vote away millions from the Treasury than it is to gather that money from the small savings of toil, industry, and self-denial.

I have spoken, sir, not as a partisan, but as a citizen; but I desire to say to the republican majority upon this floor that in my opinion the fate of the republican party depends upon the action of this Congress. We have been, during and since the war, floating upon a sea of extravagance. Money was plenty and the people did not feel the burden. But we have had a financial revulsion; business is to a great extent paralyzed, and but little money is in circulation. The attention of the country is directed to the necessity of national economy, and if retrenchment is not thoroughly enforced, the people will not only lose confidence in the ability of the individual members of this Congress to sacrifice private gratification and personal advantage for the sake of the public good, but will lose all confidence in the ability of the party in power to come up to the needs and requirements of the day; and for myself I should feel that such loss of confidence would in such case be fully justified by the facts.

I am, sir, a republican; I have followed the flag of that party from its origin to the present time, in victory and in defeat; I am proud of its splendid record and its glorious achievements during the time it has had control of the Government, and I would rejoice to see it retain its power and its supremacy. Yet to do so it must retain the confidence of the people. It can do this, not by virtue of its great deeds in the past, but by the integrity, honesty, and capacity with which it meets and disposes of the great questions of the present, and the fidelity with which it shall sustain and protect the interests and rights of the poor, and the laboring classes of the country. The masses of the people have trusted the party long, and they will still adhere to it if it shows itself worthy of continued confidence. But if, having both the executive and legislative power, it shall refuse the retrenchment and reform demanded by the people; if instead of being the champion of the poor and oppressed and of the laboring classes, which has been its glory and strength in the past, it shall come to legislate in the interest of capital, to have more care for bondholders than for plowholders, more concern for the financial credit of the Government among the money kings of Europe than for removing the burdens from the people at home; in short if, as the old whig party did, it becomes the champion of capitalists and monopolists, then from that hour is it shorn of its strength and its power, and it will sink into a small minority.

These may not be pleasant words to many here, but they are true words. The flag under which political victories will be won, in the immediate future, is the flag upon which is inscribed "Retrenchment and reform; equal rights for all classes; equal privileges to all; and equal protection to all interests."

I want the republican party to carry that flag and to carry out these principles, and I hope it will. Whether it will or not this session of Congress will determine.

FINANCE AND CURRENCY.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as numerous propositions have been submitted to this House relating to the subject of banking and currency, one of which I had the honor to propose myself, I feel constrained, now that the committee to whom all of these propositions have been referred have made a report to the House, to offer a few suggestions which I conceive to be of some importance.

The subject is one which, in my judgment, is of the highest and most vital importance to the whole country. So long as the policy of the Government is not distinctly, definitely, and ultimately settled relative to its finances, doubts, uncertainty, and want of confidence will disturb, embarrass, and paralyze every material interest of the country.

The quality and the quantity of the currency with which the business of this country is to be transacted is one of the problems—and the most difficult and complex of all—the solution of which devolves upon us. We cannot escape it if we would. The sooner it is done the better, if it is well done when it is done.

That it is one of the prerogatives of the Government to provide its people with a medium of exchange, as well as one of its primary duties, has never been questioned. That it is within the power of the Government to make that medium something other than gold or silver, and to confer upon it the attributes of money, by making it an absolute legal-tender for the payment of debts, it is now too late to attempt to controvert.

However much we might be disposed to question such an assumption of power if the claim to it were now for the first time submitted to our arbitrament, it is now res adjudicata. The power has been exercised by the Government, it has been acquiesced in by the people, it has been sustained by the highest judicial tribunal of the country, and by that decision I am content to abide.

Having been educated in that straightest sect of conservative politics, the hard-money Jacksonian democracy, I confess it was hard for me to relinquish their theory, and with it the anticipation of soon again realizing, what is among the cherished recollections of the past, the merry jingle of "dimes and dollars, dollars and dimes."

But, sir, I am forced to recognize that maxim, which has been so fearfully demonstrated in this country, "that war legislates." It makes, unmakes, and interprets constitutions as well as laws.

Whatever may have been the settled convictions of the American people as to the quality of our money, as they interpreted the Constitution prior to the late unhappy and disastrous war, the necessities of the country during that struggle compelled it to adopt as money—a legal-tender for the payment of debts—something other than gold and silver. In that emergency Congress declared that Treasury notes issued for that purpose should be a legal-tender for the payment of debts, as well as a medium of exchange. In short, that they should be clothed with all the attributes of money, and be the money of the country. The Supreme Court of the United States affirmed the right and the power of Congress to make that declaration, and such notes became, and were, and are, the lawful money of the country.

In the discussions which have been had upon this subject much has been said about the necessity of making our money conform to the recognized money of the world.

If there were any such thing as a uniform recognized money throughout the world I concede that it would be desirable, for the sake of uniformity, that ours should conform to that of "the rest of mankind." But there is not now, and there never has been, any thing that has been recognized the world over as money. There is not now, and never has been, any uniformity in the money of the world.

Every government, since the beginning of governments, has ever determined for itself what should constitute its money. A hundred different things have been brought into requisition as money at different times and in different countries. These have been as various as the different manners, customs, and necessities of the people of those countries. Among the rude savages of the forest it was the wampum; among other peoples it has been leather, lead, tin, copper, brass, nickel, silver, gold, and paper. No less than five of the substances named are by the acts of our Government lawful money in this country to-day. All that it is necessary for a government to do to create money is to stamp upon what it would change into money "its image and superscription," and declare it be money.

The considerations which, in all times and in all countries, have actuated legslators in determining what shall constitute their money have been those of expediency and practicability. The quantity of the currency necessary for the transaction of the business of the country has always entered largely as an element in these considerations.

This "necessary quantity" is of itself a complex question, into the determination of which many elements enter. While population is prominent among these, it by no manner of means depends upon that alone.

All other things being equal, a population of forty million people, scattered over as vast an extent of territory as that which we occupy, would require a much greater relative proportion of currency per capita to transact their business than the same number of people thrown compactly together, as are the people of France. Yet it is true that the people of France have 50 per cent. more circulating medium per capita to-day than have the people of the United States.

The amount of the business transactions of a country has also much to do in fixing the amount of money needed with which to transact it.

There is no country on the globe, with the same population, which, in the extent and diversity of its business transactions, can be compared with our own—stretching over an area of territory extending from the magnificent lakes of the north, where the tall pines of Michigan and Wisconsin rival the cedars of Lebanon and the oaks of Bashan, to the sunny strands of the Mexican Gulf, where the air is redolent of the odor of oranges and magnolias, and fragrant with the perfume of a thousand flowers; from the rock-bound coast and rugged hills of New England to the placid and tranquil waters of the Pacific. Embraced within this vast area are the largest and most fertile plains, the most beautiful and prolific valleys, the most stupendous mountains and mighty rivers in the world.

These plains and valleys are crying aloud to the hardy, enterprising, and industrious of the over-crowded populations of the Old World to come and possess them as an inheritance for themselves and their children, and promise them to become fruitful fields and blooming gardens. These mountains are full of undeveloped wealth. They, too, are inviting the enterprise, the capital, and the energy of the world to develop their hidden treasures. These rivers, designed by the Omnipotent to be broad highways, to bear upon their bosoms to the marts of the world the products and wealth of these plains, and valleys, and mountains demand that art shall utilize what nature has provided.

All through the uncultivated and undeveloped portion of this vast domain populations are planting and to be planted, mines are to be opened, forests felled, fields cultivated, railroads built, canals dug, cities reared, manufactories established, and a thousand other industries built up and maintained.

Sir, in such a country as this, with the amount and diversity of its already established industries and business, and the wide and inviting field for their expansion, you cannot limit the amount of their currency per capita to that of more dense and settled populations and industries, without crippling their energies, dwarfing their operations, stagnating their business, and destroying their prosperity.

During the late war the currency of the country was expanded until we had more than $2,000,000,000 of circulating medium. The consequence was that business of every description was stimulated to the very highest degree of activity. Manufactures and commerce flourished; trade and tradesmen prospered; labor was in demand, and laborers in employment at remunerative wages; railroads were extended and new fields opened up for settlement, where towns and cities sprang up as if by magic. Immigration poured in upon us, and our wealth increased as it had never done before. Labor strikes were unknown. Pauperism ceased to exist. The red flag of the commune was not seen, nor the gathering of the hungry mob, demanding "bread or blood!" Sir, the people were contented, prosperous, and happy.

But, sir, in an evil day, at the behest of a bond-holding and grasping aristocracy, the fatal mistake of the policy of contraction was adopted. Day by day the cords have been tightened, and day by day, as this process has been carried on, one interest after another has been injured, crippled, ruined; until finally, before the process was complete, every business and commercial interest has been destroyed, and the country itself on the verge of bankruptcy. And we witness the spectacle to-day of suspended manufactories, closed shops, bankrupt merchants, idle workmen, and riotous gatherings of hungry, starving, famished people clamoring for redress. They demand employment and food; the latter they must and will have, or they declare they will have blood! To furnish them employment, you must furnish more money.

The farmers and producers of the great West, who are among the worst sufferers by this artificial panic, which has been brought about in the interest and for the benefit of the bondholding monopolies, are clamoring for "cheap transportation," hoping that through that channel some means may be devised to lift from them the incubus that has settled upon all of the business and the industries of the country. Give them money enough, sir, and they can get cheap transportation. Give us currency enough and private enterprise, without any subsidies from the Government, will build your railroads; it will open up your great water routes; it will construct your Fort Saint Philip, your Georgia, your Niagara, your James River and Kanawha, and all your other canals. It will give employment to your idle, feed your hungry, and clothe your naked. It will abolish your soup-houses and your almshouses. It will infuse new life, and vigor, and energy into every department of trade, and commerce, and business. It will "lift the vail" and again give us confidence and prosperity. Give us plenty of money, and "all these things shall be added unto you."

And now, sir, a few words as to the quality of the money we should have.

Obviously it cannot be gold and silver. The same reasons that existed during the war for substituting something other than gold and silver for these metals as lawful money still exist. We have not got gold or silver in sufficient quantities to meet the demands of our commerce for a circulating medium. It would be impracticable to adopt any of the baser metals; their value is too fluctuating and their volume too great. In fact, there is no metallic substance which is not fluctuating in value. Gold and silver, as are all other precious metals, are articles of merchandise. Their value, like that of every other commodity, depends upon the supply and the demand.

It is true that heretofore, especially in the countries which have adopted these substances as their money, their supply and demand have been more uniform than that of other metallic substances, while their volume has not been so large as to become cumbersome, and they have maintained their relative value to each other and have been supplied in quantities sufficient to meet the demands of those countries for a circulating medium.

These are the reasons why gold and silver, in preference to other metals, substances, or things have been adopted as the medium of exchange by the countries adopting them. It is not true that they do not, like every other article of merchandise, fluctuate in value; neither is it true that they maintain a uniform standard of relative value. Just now the relative supply of silver in France, Germany, the South American states, everywhere, is vastly greater than that of gold. The consequence is that there is a relative depreciation of the value of silver and appreciation of gold the world over.

Then if we have not got gold and silver enough in the country to supply the demands of business for a circulating medium, or even if we had, it becomes simply a practical question for us after all to determine, under all the circumstances, what we will adopt as the legal currency of the country. Obviously it cannot be gold and silver, whether desirable or not, for the simple reason that we have not got it.

The bill which has been reported to the House by the Committee on Banking and Currency proposes to keep up and maintain the national banking system, and to make the "national-bank note" the lawful money of the country—a system, sir, which, in my judgment, is one of the most monstrous systems, ay, monstrous frauds, that was ever fastened upon any people anywhere upon the face of the globe. This system is so well understood by the members of this House, and throughout the country, that it would seem superfluous and unnecessary to detail its features.

The main features of the system, however, are simply these: The national banks have deposited with the Government in the aggregate about $400,000,000 of Government bonds to secure the redemption of the circulating notes of the banks, upon which the Government has issued to the banks 90 per cent. of that amount in bank-notes. These bonds bear interest payable in gold semi-annually. The bank-notes are redeemable in legal-tender notes, and are practically of the same value. The effect of this is to pay to these bondholders interest on $400,000,000 when they really have but $40,000,000 invested. They are, in fact, drawing interest at the rate of 60 per cent. on their entire investment, while they are loaning out their bank-notes at from 1 per cent. a month to 1 per cent. a day.

These privileges have been vouchsafed to these national banking associations for the purpose of creating a moneyed monopoly which can control the entire finances of the country; which can make money tight or loose at pleasure; can make currency scarce or plenty at any time; can unsettle the values of the entire commodities of the country at any moment; can create a panic whenever they choose; and for these privileges which have been conferred upon them the people of this country pay them the handsome bonus of $25,000,000 per annum.

> Can such things be,
> And overcome us like a summer's cloud,
> Without our special wonder?

And yet your committee propose that we shall retain this system, with but slight modifications.

Mr. Speaker, I am utterly opposed to it. I am opposed to perpetuating a fraud and a wrong. I am in favor, sir, of equal rights to all and special privileges to none. I am down upon monopolies of every description, and especially this worst, as it is the most powerful and dangerous, monopoly in the country. I am in favor of abolishing the whole system; while I believe it to be, as I have already said, the duty of the Government to provide a medium of exchange for the people to give it money. When it has done that its power over the subject ought to cease. It should be entirely divorced from banks and banking associations.

The bill which I introduced into the House a few days ago I think would substantially effect that object. It provides that the Treasury note shall be the lawful money of the country; a legal tender for all debts public and private except such existing debts as are by the terms of the contracts creating them payable in coin.

It further provides for the retirement of the national-bank notes by the redemption of the bonds pledged for their security. This alone would increase the volume of the currency 10 per cent. It would also release the reserves now held by the banks, and to that extent further increase the circulation. Such an increase would probably meet the immediate wants of the people. But to give elasticity and flexibility to the currency, and to allow it to accommodate itself to the fluctuations of trade and of supply and demand, it also provides for the issue of $100,000,000 of convertible bonds interchangeable at the pleasure of the holder for the legal-tender currency of the country.

If you will adopt this system, sir, I believe, while you will be saving in annual interest $25,000,000 per annum, you will give new life and vitality to the trade and business of the country, knock the fetters from commerce, and bid the country again march onward in the highway to prosperity and greatness.

CHEAP TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, the duties which public opinion and the wants, necessities, and peculiar condition of the country impose upon the present Congress are more important and more urgent than have ever rested upon any American Congress in time of peace.

We are privileged to live at a time in the history of this country when the development of its industries is so extensive and so rapid, and its wants are so pressing and imperious, that we need to be constantly on the alert, constantly pressing forward and studying the wishes and necessities of the people and their vast and complicated industries, or there is great danger that we shall fall behind in the race of progress, and instead of promoting it become an obstruction and a burden.

The people expect much of the present Congress, and they are not in a mood to suffer their wants and wishes to be disregarded. They are thoroughly, and I may say terribly, in earnest. And those who neglect their duty at this time may expect when they return to their homes to hear the sentence which was long ago passed upon the unprofitable servant.

Sir, aside from such a modification of our financial policy as shall abolish those special privileges enjoyed by the few at the expense of the Government, give to the people a stable and elastic currency in volume sufficient to facilitate commerce, and reduce the rate of interest to the average profits of the various branches of industry, the other great and pressing need of the country, and especially of the West, is cheap transportation. It is to the latter subject that I shall address my remarks to-day.

I hold, sir, that it is one of the first and most important of the duties devolving upon the government of a great nation to improve every available channel of internal commerce; to keep those channels open to the fullest and freest competition, and thereby to make the exchange of commodities as cheap as possible, both to the producer and consumer.

This duty is enhanced a hundred-fold in a country like the United States, whose people are scattered over a vast extent of territory, and with industry and productions the most diverse. And I say, in such a country as this, considering our vast extent of territory, diversified industry and productions, and the almost incalculable importance and amount of our internal trade, this Government will be held to be flagrantly recreant to its duty if it longer permits the channels of commerce to remain under the unrestricted control of huge and voracious monopolies, which prey upon the industry of the country, plunder the people, and eat out their substance.

That such is the present condition of the internal commerce of this great nation, no one who is in the least degree acquainted with the facts will pretend to deny; and that such will be the just verdict of condemnation passed by the people upon us if we longer neglect that pressing and imperious duty, no one who is at all acquainted with their temper and feelings can doubt. This condition of our internal commerce has been the work of time, but chiefly of the last twenty years.

At first the encroachments of these monopolies were so gradual as to be scarcely noticed. But within the last decade their rapid extension, their wide-spread combinations making competition impossible, and the proficiency of their managers in all the tricks of corruption and intrigue have made them at once the wonder, the terror, and the shame of the country. It is because the oppression of these monopolies has become intolerable that the people from Maine to California and from the Lakes to the Gulf now demand of Congress that it shall exercise for the protection of their industry the power conferred upon it by the Constitution of the United States to regulate commerce among the several States.

The only excuse that can be found for neglecting this duty heretofore is the want of experience in regulating a new and wonderful power in locomotion, the development of which has been more rapid than the wisest could foresee.

Prior to the year 1850, the greater part of our internal commerce was conducted upon natural and artificial water-routes, and the policy of the State and national governments was to encourage and assist such enterprises. But about that time the development of the railway system became more rapid, and has ever since absorbed almost entirely the public attention to the exclusion and neglect of water communication; and railway enterprises have been the recipients of nearly all governmental, municipal, and individual aid. Everything has been done for encouragement, until our railway system, by the vastness and rapidity of its development, has become the wonder of the world. Nothing has been done for restriction until that railway system has developed into monopolies the most gigantic and the most powerful for good or evil that ever existed upon earth.

These monopolies exercise an absolute and despotic power of practically by their freights fixing the value of the products of the industry of a majority of the people.

The people of the Eastern States who reside near to the sea-board and to the great markets of the country do not feel the crushing weight of this power as do the people of the West.

The people of the Western States, who are chiefly engaged in raising grain and cattle, who reside more than a thousand miles from the sea-board, and are entirely dependent upon the railways for transportation during the winter season, have been plundered until their patience has become exhausted, and they are preparing to resist further extortion.

It is obvious that the Northwestern States suffer more than any other section of the country from railway extortion. The people of the Eastern and Middle States have the benefit of more routes and of much shorter distances to reach their markets. The people of the Southern and Southwestern States suffer less, partly because their water communications are open the entire year, and partly because they are engaged in the production of staples that are of greater value in proportion to their weight than are the products of the Northwestern States. Cotton, sugar, tobacco, and rice being of much greater value in proportion to their weight, will bear transportation longer distances and at higher rates than will the wheat, corn, rye, oats, and cattle of the northwestern farmers.

The fifteen million people who inhabit the Northwestern States, (for in that term I include Kentucky and Missouri, with nine others,) and whose productions amount to more than $1,000,000,000 annually, are during nearly half the year entirely at the mercy of the railways. Whether the industry of that vast empire of fifteen millions of enlightened and industrious people, possessing a soil of unequaled fertility, shall be remunerative practically, depends upon the will of less than half a dozen men who control the trunk-lines of railway between the East and the West. That power is, I am sorry to say, often exercised in such a manner as to strip the farmer of nearly all the profits of his industry.

Navigation closes before any considerable portion of the crop can be shipped to the eastern markets, thus leaving the railways in undisputed possession of the field. Practically they control the price of produce throughout the Northwestern States; for, notwithstanding the fact that a considerable quantity is consumed in the States where it is raised, I think that after making due allowance for fluctuations in prices, which are always liable to occur, that it will be found that the price in the western markets generally approximates to the price for which the surplus can be shipped to and sold in the eastern markets. Being wholly free from public regulation or control, and wholly emancipated from the laws of competition, they can so adjust their freights as to leave the farmer no profit upon his produce; and it often happens that they leave him not only no margin of profit but nothing even for his labor.

They can also, by an increase in freight charges, enhance the value of produce in the eastern markets in the hands of rings and favorites; or, by giving special cheap rates to such parties, they enable them to make millions of dollars at the expense of both the producers and the consumers.

I trust that it requires no argument to convince reasonable men that such a state of things should not and cannot long continue; that so much power in the hands of a few men for purposes of injustice, speculation, and extortion at the expense of the wants, the necessities, and the industry of a great nation will not long be tolerated, especially when it so nearly concerns the welfare and prosperity of a free and enlightened people, who are accustomed to look closely into public affairs, and to whom monopoly in any form is inexpressibly odious.

Sir, I am sensible that these views will not meet with favor in certain quarters. There is a very considerable and very respectable portion of the community who believe that because railways have been of such great, and I may say inestimable, value to the people, in providing means of transportation where no other means were practicable; in bringing vast sections of our territory within the reach of the markets, thereby peopling, as it were, the wilderness and the desert with an industrious and thriving population, that therefore they should be let alone—should not be subjected to any interference or restraint by the national or State governments, for fear that capitalists will be alarmed, will lose confidence in them as a paying investment; that new enterprises will be checked, and old roads rendered bankrupt.

Certainly I should not be in favor of any interference by the Government if I believed that any such results would follow. It is infinitely better to have railways managed as they are than not to have them at all. But I maintain that the very reverse of these results would follow from a proper and wise regulation on the part of the Government.

Why, sir, if anything in the world would alarm the bona fide holder of railway stock or bonds, it seems to me it would be the reckless, the corrupt, the criminal manner in which many of the leading railways in this country are managed. If there are any possible proceedings that would have a tendency to alarm capitalists and prevent the sale of railway securities, they are the princely salaries that are paid to railway officials; the enormous and fraudulent contracts for supplies at outrageously exorbitant prices, in which very often the officers and directors share, thus dividing among themselves a large part of the revenues of the company; the independent fast-freight lines, in which the officers and directors are often either directly or indirectly interested, and by which the railway company is deprived of a large part of the profits of its business; the immense sums expended in corrupting Legislatures and judges, and in securing the election of favorites against the wishes of the people; the watering of stock, issued without any value received to the villains who for the time happen to have control of the company, by which millions and sometimes tens of millions of dollars are added to the ostensible cost of construction, and upon which dividends must be paid by extortion upon the public; and, finally, the outrageous extortion that is often practiced upon the patrons of the road by the imposition of unreasonably high, unequal, and unjustly discriminating rates, whereby the road loses the confidence and support of the public.

These, sir, are among the causes by which the value of railway securities have been impaired and new enterprises have been checked, and not by the demand for honesty, economy, and fairness in railway management.

These acts of railway mismanagement, to which I have briefly alluded in general terms, because the time allowed will not permit me to go as specifically into the details as I should be glad to do, are a few among the many gross and intolerable abuses which have grown up with our railway system in this country, by which our internal commerce has been compelled to pay tribute to a voracious and insatiable monopoly, our industry subjected to the greed and rapacity of rings, and the whole people plundered for the benefit of railway robbers and their favorites.

Sir, when we consider the magnitude of the power possessed by these corporations, and the arbitrary manner in which they have used it, we cannot wonder that the people have become alarmed, not only for the interests of commerce, but for the purity and independence of the Government itself. The power which these corporations have so suddenly acquired in this country, under a favoring public sentiment and by the aid of the most liberal laws for their encouragement and endowment, has become so enormous, that they only lack that supremacy which they audaciously claim as vested rights under their charters to make them more powerful than the Government itself.

Let us examine the power from a financial stand-point.

We have in the United States about seventy thousand miles of railway, with liabilities estimated at nearly $4,000,000,000, and with gross earnings amounting annually to $500,000,000—amounts largely in excess of the liabilities and revenues of the Government of the United States. And this truly alarming power is practically centralized in the hands of a few men, and can readily be arrayed against the people upon any question in which the interests of railways may be involved. It has a vast army of men in its employ and under its control; it disburses more money and has greater patronage than the Government of the United States; it is the great patron of the telegraph and the press; it can control elections and buy up Legislatures; and for all this it is practically irresponsible under our present laws. Although created to serve a wise and necessary public purpose, it can totally disregard the object of its origin, and become an instrument of oppression and corruption; and yet there is no law by which its chartered privileges may be forfeited, or the public protected from its abuses of power and trust.

As an example of some of the abuses of power and trust to which I have referred, and by which the commerce and industry of the country is burdened and in many instances crippled or destroyed in order that the men who control a huge monopoly may amass princely fortunes, take the case of the New York Central and Hudson River Railway.

Although the total cost of that road to its stockholders and bondholders has been less than $30,000,000, its obligations now amount to about $90,000,000, and it is actually paying dividends at about 8 per cent. per annum upon the latter sum.

But these figures, without explanation, do not convey an adequate idea of the outrageous extortion which the managers of that railway have imposed upon the commerce and industry of the country.

Prior to 1868 the capital stock of the New York Central and Hudson River Railway had been increased by various devices to $35,000,000. But in 1868, notwithstanding the liberal dividends which had been declared and the large sums which must have been expended for purposes of corruption, there was an accumulation of net earnings amounting to over $44,000,000, which the managers had not dared to distribute as dividends, because that would apprise the public of the outrageous profits that were made.

Accordingly, a scheme was prepared and secured the sanction of a corrupt Legislature by which $44,428,330 were divided in the form of stock certificates. And upon this sum, as upon the watered stock of many other railways, the industry of the country has since been compelled to pay dividends.

Those who believe that such extortion and abuse of trust on the part of public corporations will be much longer tolerated must have a very poor idea of the spirit and intelligence of the American people.

Are these evils and abuses remediable? Can we by a wise exercise of the power conferred upon us by the Constitution subject interstate railways to such restrictions and regulations as shall prevent these gross abuses of trust in the future, and the imposition of unjustly discriminating, unreasonable, and extortionate charges upon the industry and commerce of the country? That is the practical question which must be decided in the near future. If we are unable to decide it, the places which know us now will very soon know us no more forever. They will be filled by men who are able and willing to find a practical and thorough remedy for these abuses.

Early in the present session I called the attention of this House and the proper committees to these and other abuses which burden our internal commerce, and to the subject of providing a remedy therefor, by the following resolutions which I introduced, and which, being so amended as not to make them mandatory upon the committees, were adopted by the House. The resolutions to which I have referred, and which I introduced on the 15th of January, 1874, are as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to examine and report at an early day in favor of the most effectual means for promoting cheap transportation upon the navigable waters of the United States, and for preventing combinations calculated to prevent competition upon said waters, including the tug-boat combination said to exist at the mouth of the Mississippi River.

Resolved, That the Committee on Railways and Canals be, and they are hereby, instructed to investigate and report at an early day upon the best and most practicable plans for securing cheap transportation, both by canals and railways; for securing reasonable charges upon railways to all points, without unjust discrimination either for or against any person or locality; for preventing combinations among common carriers over such railways or canals calculated to prevent competition; for regulating and prescribing the duties of the officers, directors, and managing agents of railway corporations toward the public, and in the management of their trusts; and for punishing such officers, directors, and agents for extortion, fraud, breaches of trust, and other willful acts injurious to the public, or to the stockholders or bondholders of said railways.

These resolutions were not intended to anticipate the work of the committees by prescribing specifically the remedies for the abuses of which I complain, nor yet to include all that I think we shall be required to do, but they were intended to call attention to the subject in general, the necessity for action, and to point out the general line of policy which, in my judgment, should be pursued.

To provide adequate remedies for the evils which oppress the commerce and labor of the country is the great work to which we must give our attention at once. It is truly a great work; great as to the power and wealth and influence we shall have to combat; great as to the inestimable good which will result to the people if we do it well; and great as to the difficulties which present themselves at the very threshold of the investigation. It is at the same time one of the most important and most difficult questions with which the statesman or the law-maker has ever had to deal. Vast interests are involved upon either side. And I come to the consideration of the question with a determination to do justice to all interests, so far as I may be able to know and understand my duty; but feeling at the same time, as I cannot help feeling, that the corruption, the injustice, and the oppression have heretofore been wholly on one side, and the patient sufferance under outrageous extortion has been entirely upon the other side; knowing and feeling this, I am determined, if I err at all, it shall be on the side of the people.

Undoubtedly the first, the most immediate, remedy that can be applied is the regulation of such means of transportation as we already have, by such provisions of law as will restrain the abuses to which I have alluded, and compel these vast railway corporations, which were organized, not to plunder the public, but to serve it for a reasonable and just compensation, to conform their action to the objects of their creation.

Let me not be misunderstood in this statement. I am ready to go as far as the people wish us to go, and I desire to do it at this session of Congress, in the direction of making adequate, and I may say liberal, appropriations for the improvement of the great natural water-routes of the country, and for constructing canals of national importance. I have never been a member of a party which did not favor appropriations for such works of internal improvement by the national Government, and I never expect to be. And before I sit down I desire, if time will permit, to speak of some of the great works which I think ought to be immediately undertaken for the improvement and extension of our internal water communications.

But these works will require time as well as money for their completion; and while we should not neglect to provide at once for those which are practicable and of national importance, we must not forget that the wants of the people are pressing; that our commerce and industry are prostrated under the iron heel of a reckless, corrupt, and extortionate monopoly, and that the people expect and will demand immediate relief. This relief, in great measure, must come from Congress.

It is true that each State has the power, undoubted as I had supposed by nearly all disinterested men, to regulate commerce upon railways between all points within the limits of such State; but that is as far as the power of the State can go. It cannot regulate commerce upon railways between places one or both of which are without its limits, although the railway may pass through the State and be chartered by it.

It is perfectly apparent that this must be the limit of the power of the several States, even if the Constitution were less explicit upon the subject; for what else could prevent the conflict of jurisdiction, or where could the jurisdiction of each State end if not at the limits of her territory?

Therefore, from necessity, as well as for the sake of uniformity, the power to regulate interstate commerce is conferred upon Congress by section 8, article 1, of the Constitution of the United States, in these words:

The Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States.

Sir, I have been surprised to hear many members of this House expressing doubts as to the power of Congress to regulate commerce upon railways. Some have acknowledged that they have not investigated it, and charity would suggest that excuse for all who hold to that opinion; but they ought to reflect that such an excuse will not be very long regarded as sufficient by the people whose industry must suffer from their neglect.

I greatly regret that more time cannot be devoted to the discussion of this great question, and that, in order to say what I desire to say upon the general subject of transportation, I cannot devote as much time as I wish to the legal aspect of the case; by which I mean the power of the people through their State and national Governments to regulate commerce upon railways.

I cannot better and more briefly express the views which I entertain upon that proposition than by reading a short extract from a speech delivered by me on the 4th of last July, at Bethany, Missouri, upon this subject. On that occasion, speaking of the power of the Government to regulate and control commerce upon railways, I said:

The power of the people, through their representatives, to regulate and control commerce, both foreign and internal, and whether conducted upon land or water, is so firmly founded in reason and public policy, so plainly expressed in the Constitution, and so fortified by numerous decisions of our highest judicial tribunals, that it is truly wonderful that it should be disputed by any intelligent person. The power of the people over the railroads necessarily arises from their very nature, from their public character, and from the public use which is the object of their creation.

Their public character arises chiefly from the public use for which they are created, and from the fact that the State authorizes them to use the right of eminent domain. Without this concession no lengthy line of railroad ever has been or could be built. Why are they clothed with this supreme power?

The power to take private property for private use cannot be granted, because it does not exist; but it may be taken for public use, upon just compensation being rendered. The law upon this question is so briefly, yet fully and strongly, stated by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in the case of Sharpless vs. The Mayor of Philadelphia, that I will ask your indulgence while I read a brief extract. The court say:

"A tax for a private purpose is unconstitutional, though it pass through the hands of public officers; and the people may be taxed for a public work, although it may be under the direction of an individual or private corporation. The question then is, whether the building of a railroad is a public or a private affair. If it be public, it makes no difference that the corporation which has it in charge is private. A railroad is a public highway, for the public benefit, and the right of a corporation to exact a uniform, reasonable, stipulated toll from those who pass over it does not make its main use a private one. It being the duty of the State to make such public improvements, if she happen to be unable or unwilling to perform it herself to the full extent desired, she may accept the voluntary assistance of an individual, or a number of individuals, associated together and incorporated into a company. The company may be private, but the work they are to do is a public duty, and along with the public duty there is delegated a sufficient share of the sovereign power to do it. The right of eminent domain is always given to such corporations; but the right of eminent domain cannot be used for private purposes; and therefore if a railroad, canal, or turnpike, when made by a corporation, is a mere private enterprise, like the building of a tavern, store-house, mill, or blacksmith shop, there never was a constitutional charter given to an improvement company; and every taking of land or materials under any of them was a flagrant trespass."

It is, then, on account of the public services which railroad companies are expected to perform that the right of eminent domain is granted to them; and it is for the same reason that a county or city is permitted to subscribe to the capital stock of railroad corporations, and to employ the power of taxation for their benefit.

The supreme powers of the State, which railroad companies are authorized to use for a wise and beneficent public purpose, are not, because they cannot be, irrevocably delegated or abandoned, but are liable, at all times, to be resumed or controlled by the people, and are justly forfeited when they are abused. How ridiculous to say that powers which were granted for the public use and the public good may be converted into instruments of oppression and extortion, and that the public has no means to correct and restrain this abuse. The claim of right in the people to regulate and control public corporations and the use of powers granted for the public good is no new theory, gotten up for an emergency, but has always been the law, and has constantly been applied to many things of a similar nature.

The toll which millers and turnpike-road companies are allowed to take, and the fare allowed to ferrymen, hackmen, and draymen, have always been regulated by law, whenever, in the opinion of the Legislature the public good required it. The same reason and public policy which require these humble agents of the public to be restrained from extortion and regulated by law apply with a thousand times more force to the vast monopolies which now control so large a part of the internal commerce of the country.

I have already shown, by high authority, and I repeat, that the supreme power of the State to use the right of eminent domain is granted to railroad corporations solely on account of their public character and the service to the public which they are expected to perform, and could be legally granted for no other reason. Where is the man who is prepared to defend the grant of such power simply for the furtherance of private interests? If your farm or dwelling-house is in the way of a proposed railroad, and you refuse to grant the right of way, they go ahead without your consent, and run through your farm and remove or tear down your house; and you have no means of preventing it, and no remedy, except a just compensation in damages. Why is this? Simply because these railroads are public highways, constructed to serve a very necessary and important public purpose; and the law says that your private interests must yield to the public good.

How absurd, then, to say, after their public character is thus established, and the powers of taxation brought into requisition to aid in their construction, that the public loses all control over their operations; that they may be perverted from their original design; and instead of serving the public, as they are bound to do, with justice, impartiality, and at reasonable rates, may be converted into instruments of injustice, discrimination, and extortion; and that the public is powerless to correct the abuse. The right of the public to this supervision and control is not only founded in reason, justice, and public policy, but is upheld by numerous decisions of our highest courts, which place the rights of the people in this matter beyond reasonable controversy.

Railroad companies are common carriers, and, as such, their duties and responsibilities are well defined, even by the common law. Common carriers were always held to the most rigid responsibility; were never allowed to discriminate between individuals, but were bound to carry for all and at equal and reasonable rates. On this subject permit me to read a brief extract from the opinion of the supreme court of Illinois, in the case of the People vs. The Chicago and Alton Railroad Company, delivered at the January term, 1873:

"Conceding for the purposes of this appeal all that is claimed by counsel for the appellant in regard to the inviolability of railroad charters, regarded in the light of contracts, we are still of the opinion that the Legislature has the clearest right to pass an act for the purpose of preventing an unjust discrimination in railway freights, whether as between individuals and communities, and to enforce its observance by appropriate penalties. * * * While the law now imposes, and always has imposed, upon individuals exercising the vocation of a common carrier the obligation of rendering service to all persons, without injustice to any, how utterly unreasonable it is to claim that a corporation is to be permitted to discriminate in its tolls, at its own discretion and without regard to justice, merely because the Legislature, in the charter that created it for the purpose of exercising a like vocation, has authorized it to establish rates of toll, without in terms providing that they shall be free from unjust discrimination."

But railroad officials, well knowing that their extortion and unjust discrimination cannot be justified or upheld by the common law, have been driven to take refuge behind their charters, claiming that these charters are in the nature of a contract with the State, by which the State has parted forever with these delegated powers, and with all control over their exercise; and that these supreme powers have become vested rights in the railroad corporations. Logically and necessarily their argument leads to this conclusion, that by these charters an imperium in imperio has been created—a government existing within another government.

As a matter of fact, no legislature has ever attempted or intended to make an irrevocable and uncontrollable grant or contract; but for the purposes of this argument it is wholly unnecessary to inquire what the charters may contain, or what may have been the intention of the Legislature. If such a grant or contract was attempted to be made it would be absolutely void, because no legislation can thus surrender or barter away the sovereignty of the people.

The right to regulate the use of all property so as to promote the public health, safety, and prosperity, and the right to regulate and control the use of all franchises are parts of the supreme police power of the State, which cannot be limited or abandoned.

Fellow-citizens, I do not wish to leave this question with you simply upon my opinion; the great importance of the subject, and wide-spread misunderstanding of the law in relation to it, I think, fully justify me in making—even on this occasion—a few brief extracts from leading decisions in which it is discussed.

In 27 Vermont Reports, page 150, Chief Justice Redfield, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"There is also the general police power of the State, by which persons and property are subjected to all kinds of restraints and burdens, in order to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity of the State; of the perfect right in the Legislature to do which no question ever was, or upon acknowledged general principles ever can be, made, so far as natural persons are concerned. And it is certainly calculated to excite surprise and alarm that the right to do the same in regard to railways should be made a serious question."

In 25 Wisconsin Reports, page 196, the supreme court, in delivering their opinion, say:

"The public use, therefore, which has been held to justify the application of the doctrine of eminent domain in the case of these railroads, owned and operated by private individuals, consists in the fact that the owners cannot, without reasonable excuse, refuse to receive and transport passengers and freight, when offered at usual rates, and in the fact that the State retains the power to regulate and control the franchise and limit the amount of tolls which it shall be lawful for the owners to charge."

In 62 Pennsylvania State Reports, page 293, the court, speaking of the right of the State to control railroad fares, say:

"The right to demand any toll or charge upon any and all articles transported, or fares for passage, is derived from her grant, and the power to determine their extent depends on her discretion. It is a right of which she cannot be deprived, and of which she is the only judge."

In 26 Pennsylvania State Reports, page 307, that eminent jurist, Judge Black, in delivering the opinion of the court, says:

"When the franchise ceases by its own limitation, by forfeiture, or by repeal, the highway is thrown back on the hands of the State, and it becomes her duty, as the sovereign guardian of the public rights and interests, to take care of it. She may renew the franchise, give it to some other person, exercise it herself, or declare the highway open and free to all people. If the railway itself was the private property of the stockholders, then it remains theirs, and they may use it without a charter as other people use their own. The repeal of charters on such terms would be courted by every railroad company in the State; for it would have no effect but to emancipate them from the control of law, and convert their limited privileges into a broad, unbounded license. On this principle a corporation might be rewarded, but never punished, for misconduct. Repeal of its charter, instead of bringing it to a shameful end, would put 'length of days in its right hand, and in its left hand riches and honor.' But it is not so; railroads made by authority of the Commonwealth upon land taken under her right of eminent domain, and established by her laws as thoroughfares for commerce that passes through her borders, are her highways. No corporation has any property in them, though corporations may have franchises annexed to and exercisable within them."

Permit me to refer to two other authorities upon the question, whether the Legislature can, by contract or otherwise, abridge or abandon these sovereign powers of the State.

Mr. Greenleaf, a very able and learned law-writer, in a note to his edition of Cruise on Real Property, speaking of the police powers of the State, uses the following language:

"Powers of the former class are essential to the constitution of society, as without them no political community can well exist; and necessity requires that they should continue unimpaired. They are intrusted to the Legislature to be exercised, not to be bartered away; and it is indispensable that each Legislature should assemble with the same measure of sovereign power which was held by its predecessor. Any act of the Legislature disabling itself from the further exercise of power intrusted to it for the public good must be void, being in effect a covenant to desert its paramount duty to the people."

And in 1st Ohio State Reports, page 659, the supreme court say:

"In this country, no vested right of private property can exist or be held in the civil power or authority of government. Our Constitution declares that the sole object of government is to secure to the people the blessings of liberty, and promote their common welfare. Our Government being one of delegated power, founded upon the principle that sovereignty is inherent in the people, that civil power and authority are expressly delegated to the Government only for the public good, and that all powers and authority not expressly delegated remain with the people, it follows that the civil power delegated to the Government is a high and sacred trust to be exercised solely for the equal protection and common benefit of the people. No portion of it can be sold out by the Government, or parted with by contract.

"When in the establishment of the civil institutions of the State, or in the administration of the Government, civil power is vested or delegated to any person or persons, it is still a trust to be exercised pursuant to the design of its original delegation by the people, and ever subject to control and regulation for that purpose.

"The claim, therefore, that vested rights of private property can be created and held in the civil authority, or special privileges granted or confirmed by the Government, is in derogation of the fundamental principles of all civil government in this country."

These are only a few of the very numerous decisions that I might cite in support of these views, but they are sufficient for the present occasion, and establish beyond all controversy the right and power of the people in their collective and sovereign capacity to regulate and control the management, fares, and freights of railroads, by such reasonable and just regulations as will protect the people from extortion and unjust discrimination, and secure the public uses and benefits for which those corporations were created.

And, under the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, authorizing Congress to "regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States," the power of Congress to exercise this control over railroads running from one State into another is considered unquestionable.

To the authorities already cited I will only add a few extracts from Story on the Constitution, in which that great lawyer most forcibly and convincingly discusses the authority of Congress to regulate commerce, as conferred by the provision of the Constitution to which I have referred. He says:

In the first place, then, what is the constitutional meaning of the words "to regulate commerce;" for the Constitution being (as has been aptly said) one of enumeration and not of definition, it becomes necessary, in order to ascertain the extent of the power, to ascertain the meaning of the words.

The power is to regulate, that is, to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. The subject to be regulated is commerce. Is that limited to traffic, to buying and selling, or the interchange of commodities? or does it comprehend navigation and intercourse?

If the former construction is adopted, then a general term, applicable to many objects, is restricted to one of its significations. If the latter, then a general term is retained in its general sense.

To adopt the former, without some guiding grounds furnished by the context or the nature of the power, would be improper.

The words being general, the sense must be general also, and embrace all subjects comprehended under them, unless there be some obvious mischief or repugnance to other clauses to limit them.

In the present case there is nothing to justify such a limitation.

Commerce undoubtedly is traffic; but it is something more: it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations, and parts of nations, in all its branches; and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse.

The mind can scarcely conceive a system for regulating commerce between nations which shall exclude all laws concerning navigation; which shall be silent on the admission of the vessels of one nation into the ports of another; and be confined to prescribing rules for the conduct of individuals in the actual employment of buying and selling or barter.

Foreign and domestic intercourse has been universally understood to be within the reach of the power.

How, otherwise, could our systems of prohibition and non-intercourse be defended? From what other source has been derived the power of laying embargoes in a time of peace, and without any reference to war or its operations?

Yet this power has been universally admitted to be constitutional, even in times of the highest political excitement.

And although the laying of an embargo in the form of a perpetual law was contested, as unconstitutional, at one period of our political history, it was so, not because an embargo was not a regulation of commerce, but because a perpetual embargo was an annihilation, and not a regulation of commerce.

It may, therefore, be safely affirmed that the terms of the Constitution have at all times been understood to include a power over navigation as well as trade, over intercourse as well as traffic; and that, in the practice of other countries, and especially in our own, there has been no diversity of judgment or opinion.

This power the Constitution extends to commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes.

In regard to foreign nations, it is universally admitted that the words comprehended every species of commercial intercourse. No sort of trade or intercourse can be carried on between this country and another to which it does not extend.

Commerce, as used in the Constitution, is a unit, every part of which is indicated by the term.

If this be its admitted meaning in its application to foreign nations, it must carry the same meaning throughout the sentence.

Having satisfied ourselves that the power to regulate interstate commerce, whether conducted upon land or water, is conferred upon Congress, and that the people demand of us an exercise of that power to protect their industry from the burdens and extortions to which I have alluded, the practical question which now presents itself is, in what manner can it be exercised so as most speedily to accomplish the desired results, to give not only immediate, but permanent relief, and to interfere as little as practicable with the legitimate business interests of the country?

Sir, I am fully conscious that this question is surrounded by great difficulties, but I do not think that they are by any means insurmountable.

There are three measures of relief, at least two of which I am satisfied that we must and will adopt.

One measure that we must act upon at the present session is the regulation of inserstate commerce upon railways.

And here, at the very outset, we must not fail to remember that laws do not generally execute themselves; a remark which I think we shall soon find by experience applies very properly to the present subject. No matter what laws may be enacted upon this subject, they will be practically a dead letter unless we provide a wise and systematic plan for enforcing them. It will be absolutely necessary, in my judgment, in order to accomplish this end, to create a railway bureau or commission, the duty of which will be to collect information upon this subject, enforce the regulations which Congress may make, and exercise a general supervisory control over the railways of the country.

Without attempting at this time to go into the details of those regulations, which I trust will be done by the proper committee at an early day, I am free to say that my opinion is formed as to the general objects which we should seek to accomplish.

These railways having been created under a grant of the sovereign power, made not for the private emolument of individuals, but solely for the public good, they are in no sense private enterprises; and they should in all cases be limited to a reasonable profit upon the capital actually invested in the work. Charges for transportation in all cases, whether for long or for short distances, should be restricted to a reasonable and uniform rate. The outrage now so common of discriminating against places and individuals should be absolutely prohibited.

One of the very greatest evils of the present system is the outrageous extortion which is practiced upon places in the interior which are wholly dependent upon one railway for transportation. It is very common to charge as much, or more, for transportation thirty or forty miles as is charged over the same road for ten times that distance. Ten thousand instances of this kind might be cited, for there is scarcely a railway in the country which has not been guilty of it, not occasionally, but as a constant and systematic practice.

The superintendent of a Massachusetts railway frankly and innocently (if a seared conscience could be regarded as an evidence of innocence) acknowledged to the railway commissioners that when a car-load of freight was hauled only ten miles on his road he charged twenty dollars more than the rate over the whole road of one hundred and ten miles. In other words, he charged twenty dollars for not hauling it one hundred miles.

As a further illustration of the injustice and inequality of the present system, take the following facts, as reported by a meeting of the business men of Rochester, New York, in 1872:

Goods were shipped from the city of New York to Indiana for twenty-five cents per hundred pounds, while from Rochester, New York, to Indiana $1.25 was charged. One firm paid $1.30 per hundred from Rochester to Hannibal, Missouri, while at the same time the same class of freight was shipped from Worcester, Massachusetts, to Hannibal for sixty cents, and from Philadelphia to Hannibal for forty-five cents. In shipping to Minnesota the same firm had paid at the rate of eighty cents per car-load per mile from Rochester to Buffalo, and from Buffalo to Minnesota at the rate of nineteen cents. Let us analyze these facts and see what we have. In the first case they charged twenty-five cents for eight hundred and twenty miles, and $1.25 for four hundred and forty miles, or five times as much for about half the distance as they do for the whole distance. In the second case they charge sixty cents for fourteen hundred and five miles and $1.30 for eight hundred and thirty-five miles, or, in round numbers, twice as much for eight hundred as they do for fourteen hundred miles. In the third case the rate is more than four times greater from Rochester to Buffalo than it is from Buffalo to Minnesota.

This unjust, unequal, and oppressive system of charges necessarily drives almost every species of industry except farming to competing points and favored localities. Manufacturing in their midst, so much desired by agricultural communities, can never be made successful so long as this system is suffered to continue. It is unjust to all, but by far the most oppressive to the inhabitants of the agricultural districts.

Equally unjust is the practice common on all railways of giving special cheap rates to certain favored individuals, thus helping them to monopolize business, and prevent the farmer and smaller dealer from shipping their produce.

And right here I desire to call attention to another of the very worst features of this outrageous system, namely, the power which it gives to railway companies—and they have not neglected to use it—of discriminating against the water-routes, so that they cannot be used except by those who can reach them without the aid of railways.

A notable instance of this kind fell under my observation a few months ago. In September last I was passing through the State of Minnesota, and I found the people everywhere indignant at the then recent action of the leading railway companies in raising the freight upon wheat three cents per bushel. It was estimated that that increase robbed the farmers of Minnesota of $900,000.

You may imagine that their just indignation was not lessened when the general superintendent of one of the leading railways made the explanation that the increase was not intended to apply to through freights by rail, but only to shipments to points on the Mississippi River.

Therefore, in view of these facts, I say that it will be of very little benefit to the people of the interior to improve the navigation of the great rivers if the railways are not prevented from discriminating against them.

It is sometimes easier to illustrate the workings of a system, by taking an example confined within comparatively narrow limits, than to view it in its broadest application. I noticed during last September that a cry went up from the farmers of the Umpqua Valley, in Oregon, on account of an advance of the railway tariff of seven cents per bushel upon wheat.

The simple fact was, that there had been an advance in the price of wheat in the market, and the railway company proposed that the benefit of that advance should accrue to the common carrier instead of the farmer, whose hard labor had produced the wheat, and who, upon every principle of fairness and justice, was entitled to the advance.

The editor of the Portland Oregonian, in commenting upon these facts, aptly remarks:

It would seem as if the railway company simply watched the fluctuations in the price of wheat, and adjusted its tariff so as to draw to itself every cent that the farmer could possibly stand.

Sir, this practice has a broader field and more numerous victims. The farmers of the whole Northwest are robbed in the same way, and the aggregate of their losses amounts to a sum so enormous that we can no longer wonder that the great trunk lines of railway are able to pay large dividends notwithstanding their reckless management, and the vast sums paid for salaries and purposes of corruption.

When navigation closes each year the railway tariff upon grain between Saint Louis or Chicago and New York City is advanced from ten to fifteen cents per bushel.

To show more clearly what the farmers are losing by high freights, take the following table of the number of bushels of wheat, corn, oats, rye, barley, and buckwheat produced in the year 1871, in the Northwestern States, as given in the agricultural reports. Estimate the loss upon the entire crop at ten cents per bushel, which is certainly low enough when all the facts are considered, and we have as the total of loss upon those six staples alone in the eleven Northwestern States the enormous sum of $101,262,700. This is a moderate statement of the depreciation of value of those crops in the States named, and the direct loss to those States would, of course, be in proportion to the amount sold in other markets. But if we were to add to the above the losses upon other crops, I believe that two hundred millions would be a moderate estimate of the yearly losses of the people of the Northwestern States from railway extortion.

The following is the table referred to; which shows quantity produced, the excess in rate of transportation per bushel, and the amount of the excess:

Crop.	Quantity produced.	Excess.	Amount of excess.
	Bushels.
Wheat	149,600,000	$0 10	$14,960,000
Corn	690,900,000	10	69,090,000
Oats	153,789,000	10	15,378,900
Rye	6,625,000	10	662,500
Barley	10,019,000	10	1,001,900
Buckwheat	1,694,000	10	169,400
Total	1,012,627,000	.....	101,262,700

But not to pursue these details further, it is evident what are the wrongs we are called upon to redress, and what must be the leading features of the regulations to which railway companies should be subjected.

The evils of railway management under the present system are great, and the remedy to be applied must be thorough, radical, and co-extensive with the abuses to be removed. It will be necessary to subject railway companies to a system which shall compel honesty and economy in the administration of their affairs; which shall prevent the paying of princely salaries and the squandering of money for purposes of corruption and intrigue; which shall restrict their earnings to a fair percentage upon the capital actually invested; which shall require their charges to be reasonable for all distances, and free from unjust discrimination either for or against any person or locality; and finally, as the best and surest means of enforcing honesty, economy, and justice in their management, the duties of their officers, directors, and agents, toward the public and in the management of their trusts, should be prescribed by law, and adequate punishments awarded for violations of their duties injurious to the public or to the holders of railway stocks or bonds.

The project of building a Government railway, exclusively for freight, between the Atlantic sea-board and the Mississippi River, has many advocates in various parts of the country. I am not committed to that project, because I do not think there has yet been a sufficient expression of the public judgment in regard to it to justify us in undertaking a project of that kind and magnitude.

If we commence building Government railways it is not easy to see exactly where we shall stop. But it is undoubtedly true that such a railway, managed in the interest of the public, would accomplish results of incalculable good, which it will be difficult, and perhaps may be impossible, to attain in any other way.

The first important result of a railway so managed would be to restore competition.

Under the present system there is no competition among railways, and never will be, except upon extraordinary occasions and for short intervals. Not a rate is charged between the East and the West which is not the result of combination. The freight and ticket agents of the various railways meet and agree upon their schedules of freights and fares.

But give us one railway between the East and the West which will not combine with the others, and competition is instantly restored. Give us a Government railway, that will carry wheat from the Mississippi River to the Atlantic for ten cents per bushel, and every one of the railways between those points must and will carry at the same rate. Give us a Government railway, with charges so low that with honest and economical management it will pay only 6 per cent. interest on the capital invested, and the other railways will be compelled not only to make the same low charges, but being deprived of the chance of levying an unlimited tax upon the industry of the country, they will also be compelled to practice honesty and economy in their management.

I am satisfied that reasonable and equitable rates, just both to the people and the railways, can be better and more surely secured in this way than any other; and I am sure it is the only way in which competition can be secured while the water-routes are closed in winter.

And we should not forget, while discussing this subject, that no matter how good the water communications may be, there will always be a vast amount of business for which the water-routes can never compete with the railways. I refer to that immense commerce which considerations of time and convenience will always give to the railways in preference to any less rapid means of conveyance.

Mixed ownership, or the ownership of a part of the railways by the Government and a part by private corporations, is not an untried experiment. In Belgium the government owns about one-third of the railways; and experience in that country has fully justified the system, and demonstrated that the ownership and operation of a part by the government, in the interest of the people absolutely, prevents combinations and maintains the most active competition. And if we find it to be impracticable to secure cheap and equitable rates in this country by laws regulating the management of such railways as we already have, we shall be compelled to resort to the system of Government ownership of a part, which has proved so successful in other countries.

Various objections are raised against connecting the Government in any way with the management or ownership of railways. The strongest opposition comes from those who are opposed to what they term paternal government, or the meddling of the Government with the business affairs of the people.

But certainly there has never been a government of a civilized people which did not meddle with their business, if the regulation of commerce can be called meddling. And there is not, necessarily, any difference in principle between the building of a railway by Government in the interest of commerce and the building of a canal.

The most strenuous opponents of Government interference must admit that the necessity may arise in various branches of business where it would become the duty of the Government to interfere for the protection of the people against monopoly or overwhelming combination and oppression.

Perhaps there is no newspaper in the country more determined in its opposition to paternal government than the Nation of New York. Yet in its issue of February 6, 1872, it admits the principle which would justify such interference, in an article opposing the postal telegraph, as follows:

> There is but one case which warrants such interference and that is essentially the same in all departments of industry. That case arises for a republican government, when any one branch of the business of the community is so monopolized that citizens can no longer share in or control it, and so mismanaged that they can no longer endure it.
> When that day comes, either in the shoe trade or the coal trade, in the conduct of a Pennsylvania petroleum combination, or of railroads and telegraphs, Government is warranted, when all other remedies have failed, in prostrating private enterprise by the crushing hand of power, and supplanting private industry as best it may.

This is a very extreme statement of the principle which would justify Government interference by one of its most determined opponents.

But even if we were to accept the definition as laying down the true principle, I maintain that it would fully justify, yea, demand, the interference of Government at this moment to protect the people from railway extortion.

I believe that the language above quoted is now fully applicable to our railway system; that that branch of the business of the country is so monopolized that citizens can no longer share in or control it, and so mismanaged that they can no longer endure it.

The railway system is a monopoly in its very nature. Each railway company has a grant of certain exclusive rights and privileges with which no other person or corporation can interfere. Being a public highway, its rights are held to be superior to all private rights, and in case of conflict the latter must yield. The railway which obtains the first grant and location is presumed to occupy the shortest and best route between its terminal points, to the exclusion of all intruders; and this of itself amounts to a monopoly.

But even if the business is so great as to justify the building of a parallel road, then combination takes place and destroys competition. Competition will never, as a rule, exist in any business, except in the presence of competing forces too numerous to combine. And it must be perfectly evident to the most casual observer that this can never be the case in respect to railways. It never has been the case even at the great railway center; but even if that could be, it would result in no benefit to the tens of thousands of other places which are not so favorably situated.

Again, it is urged by others, in their great solicitude for the welfare of the railways, that the building and operation by the Government of a railway which should afford cheap transportation to the people would interfere with the vested rights of railway companies already created, would depreciate their property and render them bankrupt. This argument certainly admits one thing, namely, that the people would get cheap transportation.

As the proposition is not to build a Government railway to do business for nothing, but for a reasonable profit, it is difficult to see what vested rights of the railway companies would be disturbed, unless it is that which they claim and exercise—of practicing extortion upon the public. The same principle carried to its logical results would prevent the improvement of rivers or the building of canals, because that also would greatly affect the business of railways.

Although a new application of it, this is not the first time we have heard of this argument, so unworthy of the age of progress in which we live. The railways themselves, at an early day, when they applied for their charters, encountered the same objections from those who maintained that the building of railways would interfere with such vested rights as belonged to turnpike and plank-road companies. Such appeals come with a bad grace from corporations which received their great privileges, including the power to obtain the right of way in opposition to private right, solely on the principle that the public good is superior to the rights of the individual. As they acquired their power, so must they exercise it. For the public good they received the grant, and for the public good they must use it.

Therefore if we find that a Government railway is necessary to secure cheap transportation, or that it would materially promote that great end, I trust that we shall not hesitate to give it our approval.

Sir, in conclusion (for I see that my time is already exhausted) let me entreat the attention of the House to the best, the surest, the most permanent means for securing cheap transportation for our internal commerce by the improvement of the great rivers, the channels connecting the great lakes, and by the construction of such canals as are absolutely needed and are of national importance.

That vast section of country known as the Mississippi Valley, unequaled in fertility, which now contains nearly one-half of the population of the United States, and which is destined at no distant day to contain an immense majority of that population, which is unrivaled in the production of the great staples of agriculture, and contains mines, the extent and wealth of which cannot be estimated, is also most abundantly supplied with natural facilities for cheap transportation. Bounded on the north by the Lakes, and on the south by the Gulf, and with great rivers stretching throughout its entire extent, comprising in all nearly ten thousand miles of navigable river, the Mississippi Valley possesses the grandest system of water communication which can be found in any part of the world.

But those lakes and rivers, like everything else upon earth, are imperfect, and require improvement to fit them for their highest uses. The improvements heretofore made have generally been of a temporary nature, and such as the bare necessities of the case demanded. But the time has come when a change of policy is absolutely demanded by the necessities of the people of that section.

Within the last twenty years the population and products of the Mississippi Valley have increased with a rapidity and to an extent heretofore unparalleled in the history of the world, and the means of transportation that were adequate ten years ago now fall far short of meeting the demands of the immense commerce of that valley.

In regard to the natural and most obvious remedy for this want, the views which I expressed in the speech to which I have heretofore alluded I have found no reason for changing, and I therefore reproduce a few sentences:

> Although the Mississippi River is navigable for more than two thousand miles, and has a channel usually deep and broad enough to meet all the requirements of the immense commerce of this valley, yet obstructions are found at various places, and, at others, are constantly formed by the shifting sands. The greatest difficulty is found at the mouth of the river, where the sediment carried by the current settles and accumulates, leaving the channel so shallow as to require constant dredging. But even that affords but a small part of the relief required; and ocean steamers leaving New Orleans, loaded with grain for the great markets of the East and of Europe, are constantly stranding upon the ever-accumulating sands at the mouth of the river, and are compelled to unload and reload their cargoes at great expense before they can finally start upon their ocean voyage. All this adds greatly to the cost of transportation, and is all a tax upon the producers.
> Various projects are now in contemplation, calculated to relieve the internal commerce of the country from railroad monopoly, by a system of canals to be constructed by the Government and free to all. Many of these are doubtless impracticable, or would be too expensive to justify their construction. But others are not only practicable, but would be of such inestimable value that it is almost unaccountable that they have been so long neglected. In my judgment the first in importance and in its perfect practicability is the project known as the Fort Saint Philip Canal, which, starting from the Mississippi River a few miles above its mouth, would run six and a half miles through a country perfectly flat, and lower, even, than the river in high water, and but little higher than the Gulf, and into the Gulf of Mexico at a point where its depth is always sufficient for the largest vessels. A single lock at the point of convergence from the river would shut out the current and the sand. By this route I believe that your grain could be shipped to the city of New York for 50 per cent. less than it can ever be done by railroads, and more than 100 per cent. less than the railroads charge at present. This canal, of such inestimable value to the millions of people who inhabit the great valley of the Mississippi, would cost less than the post-office in the city of New York.
> Perhaps second in importance is the project of uniting Lake Michigan with the Mississippi River through the medium of the Illinois River and a ship-canal, thus connecting the navigation of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers with the great lakes, the Saint Lawrence and Hudson Rivers, and the Erie Canal, and affording facilities for internal commerce unequaled in any other part of the world.

I do not by any means assume, or take it for granted, that these works to which I have referred are the only ones of the kind which should be undertaken by the Government, for I feel assured that after the Fort Saint Philip Canal, which I regard as first, there are several others of nearly equal merit and importance, all of which I trust will receive due consideration when presented.

The construction of the Fort Saint Philip Canal, and the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers and their tributaries, which must be the logical sequence of that work, will furnish a cheap and safe outlet to the ocean for that which is destined at no distant day to be the greater part of the commerce of the United States; and it should, in my judgment, be among the very first subjects to receive the attention of Congress.

Great and not unmerited praise has been bestowed upon the Forty-third Congress, because it has inaugurated this grand system for providing cheap transportation—has appointed committees to investigate, to collect facts, and to report upon the subject with a view not only to the regulation of railways, but to the construction of canals and the improvement of rivers. The work of preparation has been far advanced, and we are now near to the time when the work of legislation must begin. If we fail in our duty we may retard, but we cannot defeat, the will of the people, nor change the destiny of this great nation.

"The edict has gone forth;" these improvements must and will be made. The grasp of monopoly must be loosened from our commerce; the nightmare of corruption must be shaken off. If we fail we shall receive the just condemnation of the people, and wiser men will be sent to take our places and perform those duties which we have neglected. But I feel assured that we shall not fail; that we shall catch the spirit of the people whose will it is our duty to obey, and who have spoken emphatically, though with deliberation, upon this great question.

And let economy go hand in-hand with these improvements. Instead of squandering unnecessary millions upon palatial post-offices and custom-houses, let us cut off every extravagant expenditure, and devote the surplus revenues to the great and beneficent work of providing cheaper transportation, to the end that the laborer, the farmer, the producers of all articles, may receive the just rewards of their industry.

Mr. HAVENS. I yield first to my colleague [Mr. WELLS] who has a request to make to the House.

Mr. WELLS. I have prepared some remarks upon the transportation question. I will not take up the time of the House with delivering them, but will ask leave to have them printed in the RECORD, as a portion of the debates of this House. [See Appendix.]

No objection was made, and leave was accordingly granted.

Mr. HAVENS. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HAYS.]

CIVIL RIGHTS.

Mr. HAYS. Mr. Speaker, passing in review the memorable events that have occurred within these walls, none is possessed of more significance than the one which we daily behold, of a race of people, from whose limbs the fetters and chains of slavery have been but recently dropped, asking and imploring for the passage of some law that will guarantee to them the sacred and inalienable rights of liberty and freedom. Human beings like ourselves, possessed of all the cravings of ambition that belong to mortals here below, it is not strange that they appear before this august tribunal with such natural demands. Hailing from a section of our country where, unfortunately, passion and prejudice have ruled the hour, with an honest intent to do justice alike to the unlettered and the ignorant, the rich and poor, the white and colored, I confess I approach the discussion of this subject with diffidence and with caution. If in the dim vista of futurity a single ray of hope could be discovered upon which to predicate the belief that nature would work the solution of this great race problem, for one I should be content to bide the time; but when the forecast to the colored people, a large number of whom I represent, looks so dismal and so gloomy, the whisperings of conscience tell me the path of duty is open and clear.

I am very well aware, sir, that in taking the step I do I shall receive the censure of those who sit and worship in the temples of a dead past, forgetful of the great events which have been indelibly recorded upon the pages of our country's history within the last decade. I am aware, sir, that the hate of the ignorant and the scorn of the untutored will be invoked against me. All these things are sources of profound regret; but they shall not deter me from the faithful discharge and sacred observance of a duty which God, reason, and conscience tell me is right.

Coming from the far South, being once the owner of a large number of slaves, thoroughly conversant with their history in the past and present, I feel that I have some idea of what should be accorded them now. Set free by the strong arm of Federal power, cut adrift upon the cold charities of an inhuman world in ignorance and penury that they did not bring upon themselves, struggling against adverse winds and storms of hate, in my opinion, sir, the colored race have set an example that fairly entitles them to the plaudit of "Well done, ye good and faithful servants."

The discussion of this question of "civil rights" has brought about a state of feeling in the South which is to be deplored. Fancies have taken the place of facts. Imagination has been called upon to paint pictures which reality could not do. Newspapers, politicians, demagogues, and inciters of sectional hate have preached to the white masses of the South that Congress was upon the verge of enacting a law enforcing "social equality" and blotting out the lines between knowledge and ignorance. You and I know better; but the text has been taken from the bible of democracy, and will be preached to those who will listen without reasoning and believe without knowing.

The bill proposed for adoption does not force anything but that which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] has expressed, the "right of the colored man to be the equal of the white man, if he can."

Gentlemen upon the other side of the House tell us that the negro is the inferior of the white man, and that when in the struggle of life the two races come together, the black must inevitably go to the wall before the superior knowledge and energy of the white man. Very well, Mr. Speaker. Concede this point to be true, and the fact remains that no possible damage can result to the white man from the passage of the civil-rights bill.

The appeal is made that such an undying antipathy exists between the races as will render this law dangerous to be passed. I believe no such twaddle. Thousands of the most intelligent men of the South were born and raised upon the old plantations. Childhood's earlier days were passed listening to the lullaby song of the negro nurse, and budding manhood found them surrounded by slave association. Was there prejudice then? Was cry against "social equality" raised then? Never, sir; but now that they are free and receiving the enlightenments of education, for the first time the fact is discovered that the negro, who molded our fortunes, built our railroads, erected our palatial mansions, and toiled for our bread, is a curse upon the face of the earth, and not entitled to the protection of society.

Sir, for one, as a southern man, I feel a debt of gratitude to them. I remember that when the tocsin of war called southern men to the field of battle; when our whole country, from Virginia to Texas, was populated by none other than women and children, and when "insurrection" and "revolt" could have butchered those that were near and dear to us, the poor negro toiled on and toiled well; protected our defenseless homes, and fed our destitute widows and starving children. In that hour of bondage and slavery they proved true to me and mine, and now that it lies in my power to pay the debt, the instincts of honor tell me to do it willingly and cheerfully, "as best becomes a man."

No possible harm can come to the white man by the passage of this law. Get upon the cars to-morrow morning and start South; take your seat in the finest palace-car, and you will find southern women traveling and sitting side by side with colored women as nurses and servants. Is objection raised to this? Not at all. Does any one feel debased by the negro there? Not at all. Why then should the case be changed when that negro buys a first-class ticket and travels alone? Have not southern men associated with them for ages? Has any great conflict arisen heretofore? If "social equality" has been practiced it has been voluntary.

Sir, this talk about "social equality" will not bear the scrutiny of reason and common sense. It is the cry of the old-time office-holder and cod-fish aristocrat, who uses the negro now as he once did the poor white man—to make capital of. Who brought about this state of affairs? When the thirteenth amendment was offered to the South was it accepted? No, sir; the very men who to-day are deluding the people by the specious cry of "social equality" caused the South to reject that proposition. Andrew Johnson and his providential provisional governors dictated the policy of the South. That move failed. Then came the fourteenth amendment, and, last of all, the fifteenth amendment. If, then, any one is responsible for the present state of affairs it is the southren democracy themselves, who would not listen to reason, but rushed blindly on in the wonted paths of prejudice and hate.

This new issue is upon us and must be met. There is no ground for retreat. The past is gone, and the present is upon us. True-hearted patriots cannot swerve from the path, but, guided by the logic of events, must cheerfully accord to our colored fellow-citizens every right that belongs to a "freeman," and every privilege that is guaranteed them by the Constitution of the country. "The world moves;" and a vindication of our course will come as sure as the waters flow or the stars shine.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. McCORMICK. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HAVENS] yields to me that I may ask to have printed in the RECORD some remarks, one speech being upon the subject of the Washington Monument, and the other on artesian wells and irrigation. [See Appendix.]

There being no objection, leave was granted.

NATIONAL FINANCES.

Mr. HAVENS. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of attention to the views which have been presented here by various gentlemen; and finding that my theories on the subject of finance differ from those generally advanced on this floor, I wish to submit the results of my own reflection on this question.

I believe the Government ought not to be in default, as it now is, in its promises. It issued greenbacks with a qualified or understood promise to redeem them, yet now payment is refused. This course was a necessity in war time, but now Government is rich, abundantly able to fulfill its promises according to their tenor, and ought to do it. Government bonds can be sold for gold at about par in the principal money markets of the world, and, consequently, its non-redemption appears to be inexcusable. There is a great fallacy prevalent that specie payments can only be brought about by a contraction of the currency. The people of the West are unwilling to have the circulation diminished, preferring an extension of it; while the merchants in the East are very urgent in their demands for a specie basis, so that our trade with foreign countries may be carried on more equitably. The correct theory is, that specie payments should be resumed at once, and by expansion rather than by contraction.

I submit these ten propositions:

1. Unlimited banking, on a specie basis, for banks of issue, deposit, and loan.

2. I would have these banks deposit at Washington United States bonds, to secure their circulation, bearing not over 5 per cent. interest, the banks to receive from the Government 90 per cent. of the par in national-bank notes.

3. These banks, when located in cities of more than fifty thousand people, should keep reserves of 30 per cent.; such reserves to be one half in gold and greenbacks, and the other half the same or in Government bonds; the banks to pay all demands in either, as shall be required by its creditors, so far as their wishes can be complied with.

4. Nothing should be counted as reserve which is not the actual property of the bank.

5. Banks should have no place of redemption except over their own counter.

6. They should have the right to carry bills to Washington, $10,000 at one time, and get bonds in exchange bearing 3.65 per cent. interest, or higher, if necessary; such bonds to be convertible into bills at the will of the holder, after a week's notice if necessary.

7. I would have the United States extend its issued greenbacks to $400,000,000, with $50,000,000 more as a reserve, and to issue as much fractional currency as the people will take.

Mr. FIELD. If the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WILLIAMS] will allow me, I would like to put a question to him.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. Yes, I will hear the question, but will not agree to answer it.

Mr. FIELD. I understand the gentleman to take the ground that there should be no limitation with reference to the amount of fractional currency. Is that so?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. FIELD. Well, then, if the gentleman is in favor of no limitation as to the amount of the fractional currency, why does he insist that there should be such a limitation with reference to the larger notes, called greenbacks?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Massachusetts. I decline to answer the question. [Laughter.]

8. The Government should redeem greenbacks with gold on demand, or with Government bonds or certificates, at one week's notice, at 3.65 per cent. interest.

9. The Secretary of the Treasury should always keep a reserve of over $30,000,000 of gold in the Treasury. When this reserve becomes reduced to the amount mentioned, he should have authority to sell Government bonds for gold at any price.

10. These bonds should be exchangeable back, when presented in sums of $5,000 or $10,000; bills to be given for them after proper notice. I would have the Government issue two classes of bonds to be exchanged for bills: one class for greenbacks, for which the holder would have the right to demand greenbacks; another class for national-bank notes, for the redemption of which the Government would have its option to use national-bank notes or greenbacks, as its convenience might be suited.

This plan would prevent contraction of the currency, and at the same time would not cause it to expand suddenly—only as it would be needed by the increasing business of the country. It would at once bring gold into circulation, and enable us, in case of necessity, to relieve a stringent money market by importing from other countries. In the recent panic the large importation of gold did not give the relief it should have done, because in adding to our circulation it required some currency to manage it. This plan would also give us the flexible currency so much needed at certain seasons of the year to move our wool, grain, and cotton crops. There is no danger of its giving us too much circulation. No one can form any correct estimate of the amount needed to meet the demands of our large and widely extended population. It should be remembered, also, that we have four millions of producing people who are earning and hoarding money, who only a few years ago had but very little. Then, again, the rapid extension of railroads and settlements, with the great prosperity of the laboring population, calls for a much larger amount than ever before required. Some fear that the Government might be cornered by large demands being made on it for gold suddenly. But it would be difficult to collect a very large amount of greenbacks for this purpose, as every bank would hold a portion of its reserve, and so large an amount would thus be absorbed that it would be almost impossible to bring together sufficient at one time to embarrass the national Treasury, especially with the knowledge that the Government could protect itself by selling its bonds for gold.

Mr. HAVENS. I now yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MELLISH.]

THE MONEY OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. MELLISH. Mr. Speaker, the question of the currency is a question in which every person in the country is deeply interested; and it will not be denied that it is worthy of the undivided attention of every one who wishes to see our country progressive, prosperous, and happy. Taking a certain view of the matter, this financial or currency debate reminds one of the sick man, who, having a consultation of five doctors in the next room, felt better, got up, and went out to sawing wood. Meanwhile the doctors, agreeing that he had but a few hours to live, went to his bed to announce the conclusion gently to the moribund patient, and were of course more astonished than flattered. Those who take this view will think that the best thing to be done this year is nothing, with regard to the currency. They say that there has been an inflation, and that must satisfy the inflationists; and we shall before July next be at the end of debate about remedies for diseases already cured. It was a fierce shock, like unto one throb of an earthquake, but behold how soon it is forgotten and the statu quo being restored. This prompt movement toward recovery is due to the fact that specie payments are in abeyance. If we had been on what is called the specie basis, the crash would have come sooner, been more profound and wide-spread, and half the country would have been bankrupt.

But there is another view, and perhaps the correct one. Is not our present system calculated to make the rich richer and the poor poorer? Does not a so-called prosperity show itself too much in splendid turnouts, finely-dressed people, &c.? Would it not be an improvement to adopt a system under which taxation would be lessened and prosperity would show itself "in the plentiful meal, the comfortable dwelling, the decent furniture and dress, the healthy and happy countenances, and the good morals of the industrial class of the people?" It is certainly true that whatever is not attended with these signs is not national prosperity.

As a recent writer has said:

Riches and poverty are very concrete and material things, and to believe that they are brought about by some impalpable agency is not a situation in which intelligent men can rest and be thankful.

I do not propose to long occupy the attention of the House at this time. My principal object is to raise the question how the three sixty-five convertible-bond scheme of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] would operate as supplemental to the provisions of the bill which not long since I had the honor to introduce in this House. In order to consider the matter, I propose to introduce them in this place.

The bill which I presented is as follows:

A bill to provide the money of the United States, and to regulate the value thereof.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the 1st day of July, 1874, each and every national banking association may determine for itself the amount of lawful money of the United States that it will keep on hand; but every national bank and banking association shall, on demand, redeem its circulating notes at par at its own banking house, either in coin of the United States or in United States legal-tender notes.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to prepare for circulation, as standard value United States money, certificates of the denomination of one, two, five, ten, twenty, fifty, one hundred, two hundred, five hundred, one thousand, two thousand, five thousand, and ten thousand dollars, to express on their face, in words and conspicuous figures, the several above-named denominations, with vignettes, letters, numbers, signatures, and such engraved decorations as shall tend to prevent forgeries and imitations, and also express on their face that they are respectively, by the Constitution and laws of the United States, the standard and measure of values to the amount expressed on their face, in all transactions within the United States involving the payment of money, and receivable in payment of all debts, public and private, and shall be a legal tender, at their face value therefor, except the funded debt of the United States, which is by its terms payable in gold, and except as hereinafter provided, and shall be received in deposit at par by all national banks and banking associations. Such certificates shall be put in circulation and applied by the Secretary of the Treasury under, in pursuance of, and in the manner in this act provided.

SEC. 3. That all customs duties due and payable to the United States shall be paid and collected in gold coin and paper currency as follows: From and after the 1st day of July, 1874, to and until the 30th day of June, 1875, both inclusive, said customs duties shall be paid and collected, one-fourth in Treasury notes, or other currency of the United States, or circulating notes of national banks, and three-fourths in gold coin of the United States; from and after the 1st day of July, 1875, to and until the 30th day of June, 1876, both inclusive, said duties shall be paid and collected, one-half in Treasury notes, or other currency issued by the United States, or circulating notes of national banks, and one-half in gold coin of the United States; from and after the 1st day of July, 1876, to and until the 30th day of June, 1877, both inclusive, said customs duties shall be paid and collected, three-fourths in Treasury notes, or other currency issued by the United States, or circulating notes of national banks, and one-fourth in gold coin of the United States; from and after the 1st day of July, 1877, the whole amount of customs duties shall be paid and collected in Treasury notes, or other currency issued by the United States, or circulating notes of national banks.

SEC. 4. That on and after the 1st day of July, 1874, all customs duties, proceeds of taxes, and sales of public lands, interest, and dues from all sources received for account of the United States in Treasury notes and circulating bank-notes, by each and every officer of the United States, shall be transmitted in the identical currency received to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury shall issue and promulgate, to all Federal officers authorized to receive such moneys for account of the United States, rules, regulations, and instructions prescribing, directing, and regulating the time, manner, and means of transmitting such sums of money from the places where they are received to the Secretary of the Treasury at Washington, and such rules, regulations, and instructions shall have like obligation and effect as if the same were embodied in this act.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury on receiving for account of the United States, Treasury notes and circulating bank-notes, as provided in the last section, shall cause a memorandum of all such notes to be made and kept in books appropriate for the purpose, and as often as the sum of notes so received shall amount to $1,000,000, he shall cause the same to be destroyed by burning them to ashes, as directed by section 24 of the act to provide a national currency, approved the 3d day of June, 1864. He shall cause a certificate and record of such destruction and burning to be made and entered in the books above mentioned, and a duplicate of so much of said certificate as relates to such portion of the destroyed paper currency as consisted of circulating notes of national banks (or associations) shall be transmited to the several banks (or associations) the circulating notes of which shall have been destroyed, and then the amount of circulating notes permitted by law to be issued by such banks, respectively, shall be reduced to the extent of the circulating notes so destroyed; and when and as often as the circulating notes of any such bank or association shall have been destroyed under the provisions of this act to the amount of $50,000, the Secretary of the Treasury shall adjust the interest account with such bank or association, and release and deliver up an amount of the United States bonds pledged for the redemption of a like amount of the circulating notes of said bank or association.

SEC. 6. That immediately upon the destruction of any sum of Treasury notes and circulating bank-notes, in pursuance of the provisions of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay into the Treasury of the United States, of and from the United States certificates of standard value authorized and provided under the provisions of this act, an amount equal to the total sum of Treasury notes and circulating national-bank notes so destroyed as aforesaid, and such certificates so paid into the Treasury shall thereupon and hereafter become and be the lawful money of the United States, and as such shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States for the purpose and in the manner provided by law.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue the said certificates provided in pursuance of this act so that the aggregate amount of the issues thereof, in circulation and in the Treasury of the United States together, shall not at any time exceed the sum of $800,000,000; it being intended by this section to restrict the total volume of such certificates in actual use to within the maximum limit of the sum last above mentioned.

SEC. 8. That when, in pursuance of the provisions of this act, 80 per cent. of the aggregate amount of the circulating notes of the national banks and banking associations shall have been received by the Secretary of the Treasury, and destroyed, and an equivalent amount of the bonds of the United States shall have been returned to said banks and banking associations, notice shall be given thereof by the Secretary of the Treasury to each of such national banks and banking associations. And thereafter circulating notes of national banks and banking associations shall not be received by the United States in payment of any public dues whatever, and thereafter the interest accruing on the bonds remaining in the possession of the Government as security for the redemption of circulating bank-notes shall not be paid to the banks until the whole amount of the circulating notes of such banks shall have been received and destroyed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 9. That when under the provisions of the last section circulating notes of national banks and banking associations shall be no longer receivable by the United States in payment of public dues, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem such circulating bank-notes at par, at points and places designated by him, by issuing and delivering in exchange therefor equal amounts of the United States certificates of standard value provided in pursuance of this act to the parties presenting such circulating notes for redemption, and shall destroy the circulating notes thus redeemed in the manner hereinabove provided.

SEC. 10. That this act shall take effect immediately.

The bill introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] provides as follows:

SECTION 1. That the amount of United States notes in circulation be limited, except as hereinafter provided, to $400,000,000; and that any holder of said notes presenting any sum not less than fifty dollars, or some multiple thereof, to the Treasurer of the United States, or any of the assistant treasurers, shall receive in exchange therefor an equal amount of bonds of the United States, coupon or registered, as may by said holder be desired, bearing interest at the rate of 3.65 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, which the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to prepare and furnish for that purpose; and that when any person shall demand of the Treasurer of the United States, or any assistant treasurer, redemption of said bonds, it shall be the duty ot said Treasurer or assistant treasurer to pay in United States notes the principal of said bond or bonds with accrued interest, and cancel and forward the bonds thus redeemed to the Treasurer of the United States forthwith, in such manner as the Secretary may prescribe.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury shall cause to be prepared United States notes of the several denominations now in use to the amount of $50,000,000, which shall be held as a reserve or redemption fund for the purpose of securing prompt payment of said bonds when demanded, and the United States notes so held in reserve shall be used only when needed for the payment of said bonds on their presentation, and shall be withdrawn and placed again in reserve out of any United States notes not otherwise appropriated, received by the Treasury Department thereafter; and the whole amount of United States notes received by the Treasury Department in exchange for said bonds bearing 3.65 per cent. interest shall be appropriated and applied by the Secretary of the Treasury as rapidly as practicable to the purchase or redemption of any bonds of the United States outstanding at the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. That national banks are hereby authorized to hold said bonds bearing 3.65 per cent. interest instead of the reserve of United States notes now required by law.

While I do not wish at this time to be considered as either an advocate or an enemy of the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] I propose to raise two or three questions in regard to it, not in the way of criticism, but rather for information. And first, if three sixty-five bonds were issued, convertible and reconvertible at the option of holders, would they not have the effect either to inflate or contract the volume of currency, neither of which effects is desirable? If they should prove to be so useful as to be bought from the Government in considerable amounts, would they not enlarge the volume of currency pro tanto? If widely and for permanent investment, would not the effect be to retire outstanding bonds at a higher rate of interest, and which would be desirable? Who would make permanent investment in bonds the interest upon which is not payable until the principal is redeemed?

As a partial answer to these questions, I propose to here introduce the views of a distinguished financier of New York, who, under date of the 15th of this month, in response to some inquiries I had addressed to him on the practical working of the three sixty-five plan, wrote as follows:

Agreeably to our understanding, I would respectfully submit for your consideration a few points, which, if embraced in a law of Congress, will not accomplish all we both desire, but, in my judgment, will accomplish the immediate restoration of confidence, the employment of the suffering millions, by infusing new life, activity, and energy into the prostrate industries of our people, and diffuse universal prosperity throughout the length and breadth of the land, namely:

Limit the maximum amount of legal-tender to $400,000,000, and for which substitute the legal-tender as described in your bill. Make it convertible into bonds bearing a low rate of interest, said bonds payable on demand with accrued interest. And the Secretary of the Treasury be required to appropriate all the legal-tender received for bonds in retiring a like value of outstanding Government debt drawing 6 per cent. interest in coin.

Simple as the above may appear, it is believed that it will accomplish all claimed above.

Three objections appear on first consideration of this subject, namely:

1. Will the holder of greenbacks buy Government bonds bearing a low rate of interest when interest at large rules at much higher rates?

2. And if so, will said bonds remain out, or will they, at any time, all rush in for redemption?

3. If they do not rush in for reconversion, will they cause inflation?

Answer 1. Will holders buy bonds bearing a low rate of interest? The institution with which the writer is connected is in the current receipt of some $2,000,000 per year, every dollar of which would be converted into convertible bonds as received daily; and the bonds would be held until other investments were made bearing a higher rate of interest, such as bonds and mortgages, United States stocks, State stocks, &c., when the parties to receive the money would prefer the convertible bond with accrued interest calculated in preference to greenbacks for the interest that would accrue while in their possession.

What would be the interest of our institution would be the interest of all monetary institutions in the country, including banks, to the extent of their surplus.

The same interest would control the action of all individuals in the receipt and management of their finances. Thus the largest part of the circulation afloat would constantly flow into the Treasury for conversion, and flow out again, provided the Secretary was required to use all received in such exchange in retiring the outstanding 6 per cent. bonds.

Answer 2. Will bonds convertible at the option of holders remain out, or will they all rush in for redemption? Experience has demonstrated that they will not rush in except in very small amounts, and then only to allay panics, as under the various acts authorizing temporary loans, passed in the months of February, March, and July, 1862, and June, 1864. Some $200,000,000 were deposited with the Treasury Department, for which certificates were issued virtually redeemable on demand with accrued interest, and during their existence various causes occurred to disturb the money market which at any time prior to the issue of greenbacks would have produced wide-spread panics and revulsion, but now were prevented by the conversion of a few millions of said certificates. At one time Mr. McCulloch called in $50,000,000 of greenbacks, which caused a stringency in the money market, increasing the rate of interest materially, when the conversion of some $5,000,000 reduced the rate and produced an equilibrium. A number of cases occurred when the conversion of a few millions prevented panics.

Again, the very fact of greenbacks being converted into bonds would be evidence that bonds were valued higher than greenbacks. And would it not be the interest of all to retain such bonds, for the interest that would accrue until required for business purposes, or for more permanent investments?

Would they not become portable savings-banks, and made use of as such by the masses throughout the Union?

And would they not answer for interest exchanges much better than any now in use, as the interest that would accrue while in transitu would be a clear gain to the party remitting?

Convertible bonds would be virtually greenbacks on interest, and would answer practically for all the uses that greenbacks are put to, consequently would be worth more than greenbacks. Then will such bonds be exchanged for greenbacks? No; never, until man becomes bereft of his reason, will he exchange a better for a worse investment.

Answer 3. If said bonds would not rush in for conversion would they cause inflation? If convertible bonds drawing interest cause inflation, then all Government bonds drawing interest cause inflation; consequently none should be issued.

Let us bring it home to ourselves, and suppose each of us had a given amount of greenbacks, and also a like amount of convertible bonds, and that we were about making a payment of a similar amount, which would we pay out, the bonds that would draw interest while in our possession or greenbacks that would be worth no more at the end of a year than now? Could we hesitate for a moment? No; we would pay out the greenback and hoard the bond; and hoarding is the opposite to inflation.

It was hoarding greenbacks that caused the late panic. That hoarding caused contraction, for there was only a certain and fixed amount in existence; but the amount of bonds that might and would be issued, if left unlimited, could not be affected by hoarding so as to cause contraction; consequently, under such a system, there could be neither inflation nor contraction, and a uniformity in value would be established never before known.

I see no good reason why the whole national debt may not in this way be purchased and paid off, including that held by foreigners, and convertible bonds substituted in its place and held by our own people, and thus reduce the interest about one half and our taxes in the same proportion.

Convertible bonds, if issued in small denominations, would by the natural law of supply and demand be gradually diffused throughout the length and breadth of the land, infusing new life and activity in all legitimate business.

A member of the Finance Committee, during the time Mr. McCulloch was Secretary of the Treasury, lately informed me that during the time those temporary loans were out—some two hundred millions—he (Mr. McCulloch) was constantly haunted with the fear that they (the certificates) would rush in upon him for redemption, although the books of his Department showed that for years from the first issue none came back except in trivial amounts in times of panic; and to get rid of that phantom that haunted him, commanded them all to come in, when he paid them off to prevent their rushing in!

This reminds me of an incident that occurred to a lady friend of mine. While riding on a smooth road her horse fell as if shot, and lay still, apparently dead. While her company retained their seats in the carriage, she jumped out and sprained her ankle, causing great pain. When inquired of why she jumped out, she replied that the horse lay so still she was sure he had some mischief in his head.

Mr. McCulloch was frightened from the same cause; the certificates lay so still he was sure there was mischief in it.

Had Mr. McCulloch allowed those temporary loans to remain, the existing panic could not have occurred; consequently the present suffering of the million would have been avoided.

Adopt the convertible system, which includes the temporary-loan principle; it seems to me it would act like magic in instantly restoring confidence and infusing new life in all the industrial pursuits now paralyzed and prostrate.

And thus hopefully ends his communication.

And now permit me to say that statesmen, legislators, and financiers seem to have forgotten that the interest of money is really more valuable than the money itself; or they seem not to see that money which draws no interest is of no value.

Hence they err in supposing that in making foreign loans they benefit the people. I suppose they are honest and think so; nevertheless, I am sure that a foreign loan, whether negotiated by syndicate or Secretary, is a misfortune to the people.

Let us analyze the matter of a foreign loan of $100,000,000 secured by bond at 6 per cent. interest, payable at the end of fifty years. First, we do not get the money but a credit abroad, on which we draw to pay for the imported articles, many of which had better be made at home; second, at the end of the fifty years we repay the $100,000,000 in gold; third, during that fifty years we pay in gold the annual simple interest at 6 per cent. in gold, the amount of which is three times the loan, or $300,000,000; fourth, all of this vast sum is raised by taxes levied upon the industry and prosperity of the people; fifth, the foreign creditor, by reinvesting the interest paid him by us from year to year (perhaps in other loans to us) gets in effect compound interest on his loan, which in the term of fifty years amounts to the sum of $1,700,000,000! This loan has made the foreign creditor so much richer. How much has America gained? She has received $100,000,000 and actually paid $400,000,000. This is the END OF A FOREIGN LOAN. Now as to domestic loans: The United States borrows of citizens $100,000,000, and repays to citizens the principal and the interest. Is it too much to say that the sovereign American people are made no richer and no poorer by the transaction? [Nota bene.—This is an interrogatory, not an assertion.]

I do not wish to be understood as assuming that we can keep our bonded debt at home while we pay higher interest on our bonds than is paid on the public securities of other countries. But should not a policy be adopted to keep at home as far as possible our bonded debt? One step toward that desired end might be taken at once by substituting for the securities now pledged by banks for the redemption of their circulating notes an annuity bond in the nature of the British consol, bearing an interest of 3.65 per cent. per annum. Let the amount of this issue equal the total of the bank-note and the greenback circulation, and allow a portion of the bonds equal to the total of greenbacks to be convertible at the option of the holder into greenbacks and reconvertible into bonds at like option. But I am not now prepared to advocate this measure; I throw out the idea merely as a suggestion.

This would introduce to the public this form of security. The banks would take them at par to the amount required for their use, and individuals would use them to convert into greenbacks when currency was deficient, and to reconvert when currency was redundant. This would afford flexibility enough to suit a financial India-rubber man. As our countrymen grow rich they will grow conservative, and invest more and more in this form of security, which would be in fact the "American consol."

It is asked, can a sound currency be established by the issue of national money, (tokens or coined paper,) with value determined and volume regulated by its interchangeability at the option of the holder with Government bonds bearing a fixed rate of interest? Can this not be answered "no;" and as at present advised, can such position be successfully controverted? To guard against no end of possible expansion, the volume of the convertible currency and of the convertible bonds should both have a maximum limit, or disaster would be sure to follow. Would there be a limit to expansion except the total sum of our bonded debt bearing a fixed rate of interest, which I suppose now exceeds $2,000,000,000?

And now for a moment to turn to the bill to provide the money of the United States and regulate its value.

It will be observed that the first section of the bill abolishes the bank reserve and sets free $150,000,000, more or less, depending upon the degree in which the law has been observed by the banks. It also provides that all circulating bills shall be redeemed in coin or greenbacks at the counter of the bank by which they are issued, on demand.

The second section provides for the issue, on the authority of the Government, of a circulating medium, to take the place of the present currency (which is composed of two kinds, greenbacks and national-bank notes) to a maximum limit in amount, which shall be receivable in the payment of all debts, public and private, at its face value, with the exception of gold-bearing bonds outstanding.

Section 3 provides that customs duties shall be collected hereafter, a portion in paper currency of the country, so arranged that after July 1, 1877, the whole shall be payable in the paper legal-tenders of the country.

Sections 4 and 5 provide for the retirement and canceling of the currency received as above.

The sixth section provides that the new currency authorized by the second section shall be issued in equal amounts, to take the place of the currency retired.

The seventh section limits the amount, not exceeding $800,000,000 at any one time in circulation.

Sections 8 and 9 provide means of stimulating the return of the currency now in existence, after 80 per cent. of it shall have been retired.

The bill, while abolishing the bank reserve and providing for a uniform currency, also provides for the Government's receiving all of the currency now in circulation at par and retiring it. Thus the "promise to pay" will be kept. It looks forward to the not distant time when the United States will become the greatest producers of commercial values of any nation or people; and having a standard of our own, independent of the standard of the world, and uninfluenced by its fluctuations, we shall compel all other populations to approach to or adopt a similar system of home currency, or remain subject to the disastrous fluctuations that during all past time have attended a business that is done upon a gold and silver basis. When bank-notes and greenbacks shall have been "called," then we shall need to put gold and silver in the legal category of chattels, and have only one standard of value—a currency founded on the national sovereignty, which will circulate on the credit of the nation, and all other circulation will disappear.

The world, in the infancy of finance and trade, set up the silver and gold standard as the best thing known at the time. It has been continued until the present time because the people do not know of any better standard.

It has not occurred to many that there is inconsistency in attempting to make a standard of value out of a substance which is itself a commodity more universally dealt in than any other, not as coin alone, or chiefly, but chiefly as bullion, in which form it is bought and sold for prices by weight and quality, like iron. In all this traffic it is not a standard unto itself. The conundrum not yet once solved is, how to measure the value of the measure of values. I venture to predict that this difficulty will never be cured until something of no intrinsic value shall be adopted, and its value fixed conventionally or arbitrarily by competent authority. This cannot be done now and at once by the whole world; but can be done for each sovereignty for itself at any time, leaving gold and silver as now to be the standard for paying off balances in foreign trade. If we lead the way in setting up a new system of currency which shall be an improvement on the old, so much the better for us.

It may at length be discovered that a standard of values ought to be of no intrinsic value, but conventional and arbitrary, so that it shall be as absolutely free from change and fluctuation as a pine yard-stick or a tape line. If the attribute of unchangeability is needful for a standard of values, as it seems to be, then gold and silver will not answer. They are constantly changing in value, and are prone to move from one place to another, creating a scarcity in one place and a plethora in another. They ebb and flow like the waves of the sea, or rather like its tides, without their regularity. This ebb and flow results solely from changes of value in different places. They flow to points where there is a great demand and a high price from all points of less demand and smaller price, making sad havoc of prices and values with every oscillation. Our plan would fix the volume of measures of values at $800,000,000 for the United States. It would be unchangeable, except by the action of the sovereign authority. The standard of all values being fixed and stable, the prices of commodities and property would be regulated by the relation between the supply of and demand for each article. If commodities were scarce, the price would be high and induce greater production; if they were abundant, the price would fall and check production. This is a beneficent law of trade, automatic and reliable, and is better than the highest wisdom of human legislation to regulate the value of all the products of human industry. The most ordinary minds can comprehend this. But where both the standard of value and the commodity to be measured in value by it are operated upon and fluctuate by the same law of supply and demand, the problem of current values is quite too complicated for comprehension. Prices are excluded from the field of demonstration, and turned over to the domain of speculation.

I think if this bill should pass, and the system should go into operation, our standard of value would ride into popular favor on the shoulders of the greenbacks, the value of which no American has ever doubted.

And here I ask to be pardoned a little digression, to refer to a reply I made on the 10th instant to the question of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] whether I regarded gold as a commodity. I said "no." I should have said that it was a commodity, but as a commodity it had different characteristics from flour, the article with which it was compared. Gold has an intrinsic value, and is a commodity. Its value, however, is not so much intrinsic as it is conventional. That is to say, while its value is derived in a great degree from the quality of exchangeability—in other words, from its being a commodity in general demand, and which few persons would decline to accept for whatever they have to dispose of—it gets an additional value from legal enactments and general custom. In my speech the matter will be found more fully treated. This explanation seems necessary because of the bringing into comparison two commodities of wide difference in their quality of exchangeability.

It cannot be denied that there are numerous incidents occurring in all parts of the world which have the effect of keeping gold and silver constantly in motion like a troubled sea. A war, or a famine, or a great conflagration, or a new financial policy, occurring on the other side of the world, affects the movement and the value of gold and silver wherever they happen to compose the currency or to be the basis of the currency. They are constantly varying under the influence of these foreign incidents, and therefore are unfit for a domestic standard. There are times and places when $100 gold coin will purchase ten barrels of flour; there are other times and places in the same country, and not far remote from each other, when the $100 gold will purchase fifteen barrels. Perhaps no man can tell, with any degree of certainty, whether the change has not been partly in the gold, and not altogether in the flour. It is not quite clear, with an elastic yardstick and India-rubber cloth, how we are to determine quantity.

It may require some courage of opinion to advocate a currency founded on the national credit instead of a specie basis, especially when the interests of so many moneyed institutions are bound up in the present system, and which naturally find their spokesmen in the great commercial newspapers. "But truth is mighty and will prevail." And I have been surprised at the letters of encouragement and cheer I have received from far "down East," and even as far west as Kansas. As a sample, here is one that came to hand this morning:

INDEPENDENCE, KANSAS, January 22, 1874.

Hon. DAVID B. MELLISH, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.:

I see in the New York Tribune a short comment on your speech and synopsis of your bill to provide the money of the United States and to regulate the value thereof. From the comment above referred to I infer that your plan and bill are similar to what seem to be gaining the popular ear here at this time. I would be pleased to receive a copy of your bill and speech.

Yours, &c.,

JOHN M. ALTAFFER.

And never so much as since I introduced this great reform measure have I felt the inspiring force of those grand lines:

Let us, then, be up and doing,
With a heart for any fate;
Still achieving, still pursuing,
Learn to labor, and to wait.

The seed here planted, I feel assured, will yet bear good fruit for the healing of the nation.

Turn we now for a moment to contemporaneous opinion. I could cite from several speeches in the other wing of the Capitol to sustain my view, that with a judicious volume of the currency, and under proper regulations, it could rest upon the credit of the Government, and be a measure of values superior to any the world has ever had. I will content myself here, however, with quoting the opinion of one who for many years distinguished the office of Secretary of the Treasury. (Sometimes the office distinguishes the man, and sometimes, as in this case, the man distinguishes the office.) I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 29, from the speech of Hon. GEORGE S. BOUTWELL, delivered January 22:

Mr. MORTON. I should like to ask the Senator whether, in his opinion, the legal-tender notes can be brought to par value in gold by the contraction of a part of them?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have no doubt of it. The recent history of France furnishes sufficient evidence of that.

Mr. MORTON. Without making any provision for the redemption of the balance?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Yes, sir; undoubtedly.

Mr. MORTON. That a currency which is irredeemable can be maintained at par simply by its contraction?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I have no doubt about it, with the Government of the United States behind it.

Mr. MORTON. That redeemability is not necessary to par value?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Redeemability would be a consequence, of course. When you ask me if they could be brought to par in coin, that implies redemption.

Mr. MORTON. No; I beg the Senator's pardon. Suppose, for the sake of the argument, we contract one hundred and fifty millions of our legal-tender notes and cancel them, will that have the effect to bring the rest of them to par value unless there be first some arrangement made by which the rest of them may be redeemed in coin upon the demand of the holder?

Mr. BOUTWELL. If we should go on redeeming and destroying these notes in monthly installments, other things remaining the same—war, famine, or pestilence would affect the result; the premium on gold would gradually disappear, and persons, without any action on the part of the Government, would accept the notes, and the Government would receive and pay out notes or coin without considering that there was any difference between them, and resumption would be practically taken up without any legislative action whatever. Its maintenance would depend upon the prosperity of the country as shown by its foreign-trade balances.

Mr. MORTON. I ask the Senator, as he has evidently given much more attention to this subject than I have, if any bank could bring its currency to par, when it had suspended specie payments, by the simple contraction of the volume of currency, without making preparations and announcing them for the redemption in coin of the balance of them?

Mr. BOUTWELL. The case of an individual bank is different. We are now considering the wisdom and effect of a policy of contracting the volume of currency for the whole country, and not the effect of contraction by a bank, which could have no perceptible effect upon the whole volume.

Cobbett, in speaking of the currency of England in the midst of suspension of specie payments, remarks that "the low value of paper money has been occasioned by the great abundance of it." And I find in my note-book—I am unable to remember whether the result of my own cogitation or of some one else—it is set down that "the chief quality that has brought gold into use as money is its scarcity. If zinc were as scarce as gold, it would make money of nearly equal goodness with gold. To make anything good money, it must have the quality of being a tender in the payment of debts, and its volume of issue must be judiciously limited."

Calhoun asks, substantially, "Shall we deny to the Government the use of its own credit? And does not the issue of currency properly come within the power expressly granted to Congress to borrow money? which means neither more nor less than to raise supplies on the public credit. Interest is not essential to borrowing; and it would be ridiculous to suppose that the framers of the Constitution intended to authorize the raising of supplies with interest, and to prohibit it without."

And how much gold is used even in specie-paying countries? The celebrated financial writer, Bonamy Price, in Fraser's Magazine for October, 1873, in reply to the question how much cash is brought to the bank's counter, says:

Only three parts in one hundred, and this includes currency as well as gold. Of specie—that is coin—the bank only touches one-half per cent. as compared with all its receipts.

Nothing is truer than that the people will never approve changes by legislation and of administration measures that affect the business of the country, unless it is demonstrable, from existing ills, that the changes proposed will be beneficial. The prosperity of a country may be regarded as a matter of fact, and not as a matter of law. If a community is prosperous and solvent under a system of laws, it may not be unsafe to assume that the fact is evidence that the system is sound and desirable. There would be fatuity in proposing to change the system now in operation, which it must be admitted has worked some good results, unless somebody were wise enough to point out another system which would with certainty and without doubt or disaster achieve better results.

But it is believed that the change proposed by the bill under consideration will generally be conceded to be an improvement. But no matter what change is proposed, it is essential that its operation should be prudent and gradual. So far as any shock to the business of the country is concerned, it is confidently believed that this change can be made without the slightest shock, and, as it were, imperceptibly, except so far as its beneficent influences may be felt.

If we take the national-bank notes and the greenbacks in payment for taxes and custom dues, dollar for dollar, allowing them the same value at the custom-house as the gold dollar, and do not put them out again, shall we not substantially keep the promise of the Government? Will not the Government have paid the one dollar promised on their face? Then we start anew and honestly. We issue a standard measure of value which is just as good, and will actually be worth more, in business transactions than the greenback has ever been.

One must not nowadays expect exemption from the criticism of newspapers. I do not complain of it. But I must express a little surprise that such a staid and respectable paper as the Evening Post should deal in epithets in referring to a humble Congressman because he happens to hold what it regards as heretical opinions on the subject of finance. I quote, without comment, its courteous allusion to myself in an introduction to a part of an article it copies from a communication that appeared in the New York Times:

A SPECIMEN BRICK—THE OPINION OF A DOCTOR OF FINANCE.—Mr. DAVID B. MELLISH, who holds a seat in Congress from this city, has written a note in reply to numerous interrogators as to the terms of a bill recently introduced by him in the House of Representatives. We reprint the last paragraph of this note to show the wonderful results which a year's study of financial questions has on the mind of an ordinary member of Congress:

"A year ago I did not believe there could be such a thing as a sound currency that was not redeemable in gold. Further study has convinced me that I was in error. But it would take too much space to give the reasons that have led me to this conclusion. It will be seen that the bill, while abolishing the bank reserve, and providing for a uniform currency, also provides for the Government receiving all of the currency now in circulation at par and retiring it. Thus the 'promise to pay' will be kept. It looks forward to the not distant time when the United States will become the greatest producer of commercial values of any nation or people; and having a standard of their own, independent of the standard of the world, and uninfluenced by its fluctuations, we shall compel all other populations to approach to or adopt a similar system of home currency, or remain subject to the disastrous fluctuations that during all past time have attended a business that is done upon a gold and silver basis. We have had our paper age, founded (theoretically) upon gold; we are to have our golden age, founded on a national paper standard."

In the New York Sun of the 13th instant I find the following, which appears editorially:

THE REMEDY FOR OUR FINANCIAL EVILS.—Mr. DAVID B. MELLISH, member of Congress from this city, has begun the study of finance. He has learned some things, and, we trust, will learn more. But his usefulness as a financier will not begin until he has also unlearned what he has up to this time taught himself. This circumstance, however, need not discourage Mr. MELLISH. He is no worse off than the great majority of his colleagues in Congress, and he is better off than most of them, inasmuch as we think he has some capacity of financial development. Not that he has displayed any sign of it thus far, but we have an appreciation of his merits in general and desire to encourage him.

Like all beginners in finance, Mr. MELLISH merely wishes to test the value of the knowledge he has acquired, during the brief period of his studies, by overturning our existing systems of banking and finance, and burning the whole "to ashes." Such is the language of the bill he has introduced into Congress for a reform in the currency. This is a natural and legitimate method of proceeding, because it gives a man a clear field for his experiments. And if Mr. MELLISH's plans are to be tried at all we see no objection to his proposition to reduce "to ashes" everything that now stands in his way.

Our real difficulty, our real danger, in regard to the currency, is not at all what Mr. MELLISH supposes. It is that our standard of value is a variable and fluctuating thing, so that no man knows or can know at the beginning of any one year what it will be absolutely in regard to quantity or relatively in regard to gold at the end of that year. This uncertainty converts all transactions of bargain and sale into mere gambling bets upon the future value of property, and thus unsettles and demoralizes all legitimate trade, baffles prudence, torments honesty, and renders the reward of labor unequal, uncertain, inconstant, and insufficient. These evils are increased by the speculations which such a condition engenders, and which make the trade and industry of the country the playthings of greedy and unprincipled operators, who are thus enabled to create vicissitudes in order to profit by them. It is an unsettled and irredeemable currency that is our bane, and is the parent of "corners" not only in stocks but also in leading articles of human consumption, as well as of gold-gambling and every other pernicious form of traffic.

The thing we absolutely need is not a new kind of paper money, but a fixed standard of value. With such a standard the industry, the trade, the enterprise of a country, would rest upon a measurably stable foundation. Without it every public and private interest is at sea. There is no certainty and no approach to certainty anywhere. We might almost say in the abstract that we should hardly care what this standard was, whether paper or coin. The essential point is that it be a fixed standard. The necessity is not that it be perfect, for that is something out of the question, but that it be as near perfection as human nature admits. A fixed volume of paper money would answer a very valuable purpose provided it could be really fixed. But here is the difficulty. The history of finance has demonstrated such limitation to be impossible. If men are allowed to make money simply by stamping pieces of paper, then they will go on making it until they end in ruin.

The alternative is a measure of value that cannot be suddenly changed, either through whim or fancied necessity. The precious metals form such a standard, and the whole commercial and financial world yields this function to them, and to them alone. Everything else is secondary. Irredeemable paper-money schemes of whatever description are empty, floating bubbles in comparison. They are, one and all, not worth a moment's consideration from the legislator or financier who is honestly endeavoring to grasp the situation and correct the evils which now beset the American trading world.

So much of the financial question, then, is clear and settled. We ought to have an unchangeable standard of value. This is the one bright, luminous point that projects itself out of the mass of murky vapors which surround the whole subject of finance. Everybody can see it. Everybody can take hold of it. We need a fixed measure of value just as much as we need a fixed standard of weights or measures, just as much as we need a pound-weight, a yard-stick, or a bushel measure. This is so plain that we think even a Congressman might take it in.

Now, why cannot Mr. MELLISH aid in giving the country a fixed standard of value? If he knows how to make it out of paper money let him give us the secret. He will be the wisest man that ever lived in the tide of time if he can do this. But in truth all the projects and devices to accomplish this end by changing the source of issue—and this seems to be Mr. MELLISH's specific—will prove to be in the end only baseless phantasms and empty dreams. Visions rise upon the youthful and inquiring student of finance like the phosphorescent mists of a bog, and they always lead the inquirer into the inevitable mire. There has been no possible phase of the irredeemable paper-money question that has not been considered by scores upon scores of these innocents; and still the same verdant crowds are traveling along the same path on the same errand. But nobody has ever yet discovered any equivalent substitute for coin as a standard of value. In the last analysis, and in the ultimate settlement of balances, nothing fully serves the purpose but something which is a positive representative of value the world over. This is absolutely, irresistibly needful to us; and it is just what we have not got. To the disgrace of this nation of forty millions proud, intelligent, enterprising people be it said.

Mr. MELLISH proposes to destroy all the bank circulation. It is evident he has not consulted his colleagues in Congress or studied their views. Does he not know that the House is a body of bank presidents, bank directors, and bank debtors? Does he suppose they will consent to relinquish their privileges? But there is really no valid reason now—though there was during the war—why the banks should cease to be banks of issue, and there are controlling reasons why they should remain so. The difficulty is not that banks issue paper money, but that they loan out money which they should keep in their vaults, and thereby become helpless before a financial storm. Banks of issue, under conservative management, may be and should be the sheet-anchor and bulwark of a commercial and trading community; and experience has devised no good substitute for such banks. It is the greedy and rapacious, and gambling banks that do the mischief; and the way to improve the system is to load them down with restrictions, till they can no longer torment the public with their illegitimate and damaging courses. But the right methods of doing this do not include the taking away of their privilege of issuing paper money. Banks of issue in this country, above all others, are like wells in a desert; but they should be banks of redemption also. That they are not is the great fraud of our system. The recent panic showed that they not only could not redeem their issues in money, but they could not even redeem them in Government notes. This showed them to be shamefully mismanaged, and proves that our banking system needs new and more rigid restrictions thrown around it.

Mr. MELLISH seems to think he will have done something important if he succeeds in giving the profits of issuing paper money to the Government, as if this was a matter of real consequence in considering the way out of our present insolvency and disgrace. We cannot stop to argue the question; but it is capable of demonstration that ease in financial operations can be secured, and the necessities of the trading public answered, only through the agency of banks of issue. It is mere tomfoolery in this stage of our history to talk about destroying them. Instead of having fewer banks of issue we want more. But we must insist on their being banks of redemption as well.

What the country should have is a specie standard with banking absolutely free under certain unvarying rules. But there is no tendency in the public mind toward resumption of coin payments. What, then, can we have? So far as we can see, nothing is practicable but to make the 5 per cent. gold bonds of the United States the standard of value for all bank and Treasury issues, and compel banks and Treasury alike to redeem their issues in this security on demand, and then open the door to free banking. The banks may, under such an arrangement, continue to hold and use greenbacks as they do now. But actual, valid redemption on this basis is practicable. Why not? It makes the whole debt of the United States the basis of our money issues. Is not this broad enough? We refuse to redeem our paper money in coin, because we say there is not enough of it. But that there is debt enough, heaven and earth are both witnesses.

But will this plan lead to contraction? Why should it? If the country requires or can carry its present volume of circulating medium under any circumstances, it can do it under this scheme. That there may be no limit to bank issues all over the country, throw wide open the doors to free banking. Let everybody bank who wants to and can furnish the necessary guarantees. If there is a real want, a legitimate demand for money, anywhere over the face of the whole country, the omnipresent banker will be there to supply it. And this will be a thousand times more convenient for the public than to hunt up sub-treasurers, who, when found, cannot take the securities which the merchant who wants money alone has to offer for it; but the banker can take them, and in taking them supply that elasticity to the circulation of which we hear so much, and which is really so desirable.

This proposition is our contribution to the discussion of this question. We believe in a metallic standard, and desire to see it restored. Let us have it by all means if it be possible. But if not, then give us the standard of a United States gold bond drawing 5 per cent. semi-annual interest as the next best thing. We do not want a bond bearing a low rate of interest, and least of all do we want to see the detestable and fallacious project of three sixty-five exchangeable bonds put in motion. For this means inflation only, and not redemption. But give us for a basis of experiment a gold 5 per cent. bond, and force the Treasury and the banks to redeem their issues in that. This would be a beginning which would look like business.

I do not know who wrote the above editorial, but from the internal evidence I presume it was from the pen of Hon. Charles A. Dana, Assistant Secretary of War under Stanton.

I sent to the editor the following explanation:

To the Editor of the Sun:

I had hoped my plan would have met the approbation of the able head of the diurnal luminary that "shines for all." But notwithstanding the potent and piquant criticism, in your editorial of the 13th instant, of the bill I had the honor to introduce into the House of Representatives, "to provide the money of the United States and regulate its value," I nevertheless think and believe that if the Sun will turn over certain points in what it calls its mind it will find it has fallen into certain fallacies.

In the first place, it seems to have taken exception to the idea of burning retired currency to ashes. I do not deem it necessary to apologize for using the language of existing statutes on that subject. That was the language used by Congress in directing the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of all retired currency.

I agree with you that our standard is variable and fluctuating, and it will be so as long as it is pretended to be based on a specie basis, which is itself variable and fluctuating. With a national standard beyond the reach of foreign influences, it would be possible to realize a standard which should neither be variable nor fluctuating in volume or value. But so long as we hold the same standard of all other nations, the standard will be operated upon by the vicissitudes of all other nations and the policy of all other nations.

You say that we need hardly care what the standard was, whether paper or coin, the essential point being that it be a fixed standard. That very idea was what set me upon seeking a new one, and one that could be influenced only by the sovereign act of the people of the United States. You say a fixed volume of paper money would answer a very good purpose, provided it could be fixed. Why not? Cannot the people of the United States trust themselves or their Representatives? Fix the volume, and see who dares unfix it when it becomes the standard of value for the people. You say "If men are allowed to make money simply by stamping pieces of paper, then they will go on making it until they end in ruin." Men are not allowed to do that by any system that is proposed. The Government is allowed, and all other parties are disallowed.

You say, "We need a fixed measure of value just as much as we need a fixed standard of weights or measures; just as much as we need a pound-weight, a yard-stick, or a bushel measure. This is so plain that we think even a Congressman might take it in." This is so plain that at least one Congressman is able to take it in. But that same Congressman is sure that from the beginning of the Government until now we have supposed we had a standard of gold and silver; and yet the human mind can hardly contemplate more vacillations more terrible fluctuations, more bankruptcies, than we have experienced under the boasted régime of the specie standard. Inasmuch as our experience shows that in that quarter we find no fixed standard, let us seek for one that is within the control of the Government of the United States, and it only.

Very respectfully,

DAVID B. MELLISH.

Thereupon, in the Sun of January 22, its editor responded as follows:

SHALL WE HAVE A FIXED STANDARD OF VALUE?

Mr. DAVID B. MELLISH, M. C., reviews our conclusions and restates his own in a communication which does not seem to us to advance the discussion. His fundamental error is in supposing the world is going to stop and reduce things "to ashes" in order that reformers may try their experiments. All we can hope to do in our reforms is to modify and mend. If we ever reach perfection it will be through very easy stages.

Our present money system is the fruit of a national necessity, and in its leading characteristics it is likely to stand as it is for a good while to come. We think it a waste of time to debate the question whether something theoretically better could not be devised. We have got greenbacks, and people like them. We have got national-bank notes, and people like them. They are so well satisfied that they hoarded both during the recent panic, and contentedly let the storm howl. The men who had either did not conceive it to be their watch on deck. It was not they who were in danger. Now, who can suppose the people are going to quarrel with a system which seems to them to work so well, or that they will suddenly overturn it?

All that can be done, and all that need to be done, is to improve the existing situation. All the talk about winding up the banks and substituting greenbacks for their notes is idle babble. It ought not to be done if it could, and it could not be done if it ought. All trading communities, at least those which are the most thrifty, are full of banks of issue. They are as necessary as steamboats and railroads and telegraphs for the prompt and easy transaction of business. We cannot waste time, therefore, on Mr. MELLISH or anybody else who begins by proposing to get rid of them. But we do want them to be made paying as well as issuing institutions; and we want to see the system extended on this basis. We want them to be made to pay. We want them to be put under a system which shall force them to redeem their notes in something besides irredeemable promises. And to get at this in the easiest manner we ask to have the greenback, in which their issues are redeemable, itself made redeemable in something which has a positive, intrinsic value, such, for example, as gold or silver; or if that be impracticable, then in a gold-bearing bond of the United States as nearly of equivalent value as possible.

This is the simple plan which we propose. It can be put in motion noiselessly, and need necessarily create no commotion or contraction whatever. Accompanying it with the system of free banking, it might even increase the volume of the circulating medium during an active demand for money. If the country needs such an increase it certainly would be furnished.

This plan avoids the difficulties and dangers of coin redemption in that nobody would, merely as a matter of speculation, run the banks or the Treasury for bonds, which are themselves only objects of sale. Keep the bank-note circulation secure as it is now, force a central redemption, and give the country full swing. Let everybody then issue bank-notes who wants to do so, and can give the requisite security that they will be redeemed on presentation. To insure the perfect operation of this system, it is only necessary that we should erect a real standard of value as the basis of payment. Our proposition is to take for this standard the 5 per cent. gold bond of the United States. We offer this as a compromise between specie redemption and no redemption at all, which is our present condition, and which is fraught with excessive peril. There is no safety, no bulwark against indefinite inflation of the currency but to put an end to the practice of regarding the irredeemable demand note of the Treasury as money, and to bring everybody, the Treasury included, to the touchstone of redemption in something which carries a valid and positive meaning and value on its face.

We can have this and disturb no existing arrangements. We do not need to "burn to ashes" greenbacks, bank-notes, or anything else. We only ask for the application of the honest rule that everybody shall be held to fulfill his promises; that when banks and bankers agree to pay, they shall pay; that when the Treasury says it will pay, it shall pay. It is a disgrace that the country has not done this long ago. And day by day this condition of suspension works wider damage. As a non-paying nation we are losing the prestige we gained by the heroic efforts, military and financial, made during the war. New York is losing all chance of becoming a financial center of the world by our persistence in the use of irredeemable promises to pay as our standard money. London is gaining a permanent advantage over us for this reason, and is more and more becoming the settling-house and depository of all nations, because it faithfully adheres to the specie standard of value. In other words, it fulfills its promises to pay.

It is nothing but this that gives London its prestige and its position as the settling-house of the world. It is nothing but this that makes capital seek London, and fills that market to plethora with it. The one thing that makes all the difference between us is that London maintains her financial integrity and we do not. She pays and New York does not. This is the most short-sighted policy, to say nothing of higher considerations, of which an enterprising and commercial nation was ever guilty. Should we not take some steps toward extricating ourselves from so disgraceful a position?

And now comes the Whitehall (New York) Chronicle, et id genus omne, a molder of opinion for the rural districts, and thus gives dignified utterance to its opinions:

FINANCE RUN MAD.—Mr. DAVID B. MELLISH is a member of Congress from New York City; likewise a republican; also a representative of one of the respectable silk-stocking districts of the city. But too much study on the financial questions of the hour, combined with the responsibility on him of being a republican Representative from New York City, has made him mad. MELLISH has seen enough of the evils of a currency resting on a specie basis. He denies the postulate that gold should regulate the value of paper. He claims that instead of redeeming paper with gold, gold should be redeemed with paper. He feels outraged that the paper currency of the free American people should be measured by the base metallic gold and silver standards of Europe. On the contrary, the American legal-tender should be the standard of value of the British sovereign, the French louis d'or, and the Spanish milled dollar. Hurrah for MELLISH! Throw silver and gold to the wind and hoard paper rags.

On the other hand, the New York Herald, by many regarded as a first-rate indicator of public opinion, the New York Mercantile Journal, and other papers, approve a uniform currency, and favor the provision therefor in the bill.

I have not the time to review these reviews or criticise those criticisms, and must hasten on, only saying, en passant, employing the appropriate language of William Cobbett, in his essay on Paper against Gold, that "this is always the way; it is the constant practice of those who, while they are, from whatever motive, impelled to oppose a writer, want either the materials or the ability to show that he is wrong; and, gentlemen, you may lay it down as a maxim, that when any publication is answered by abuse, and especially personal abuse, the author of such publication is right, or, at least, that his abusers want the ability to show that he is wrong. Facts and reasonings, if erroneous, always admit of refutation; but, if correct, no one can refute them; and, if erroneous, to refute may still require some ability, whereas to abuse the person from whom they have proceeded is within the power of every one, a gift not denied to any creature capable of uttering articulate sounds or of making marks upon paper. The great cause, however, of abuse in such cases is the weight of the truths against which such abuse is opposed; for it is here as in common verbal disputes, he who has the truth clearly on his side is always seen to be in good temper, while his opponent scarcely ever fails to discover impatience and anger, and, in but too many cases, to give way to personal invective and false accusation."

It is safe to say that from the era of commercial credits until now the system of specie basis for commercial credits has been more or less, and generally more, a system of false pretense. It is reasonably to be suspected that the acute minds who have studied this business of operating in money—the brokers, the speculators in funds, et al.—all knew it was so; and the people generally, by a little study, may now know it.

This system here proposed, when it was in full operation, would set free all the gold in the country to be used for purposes for which gold is sought for by mankind. Now, under the system of specie payments, an amount of gold and silver equaling something like one-fourth the amount of gold must be kept idle in the vaults without any use. It would add to the wealth of the country the total amount of gold and silver which is set free. If under the system of specie payments the whole amount of gold and silver that is held for the purpose of redemption is lost for the time being to mankind—it produces no interest; it is of no value so long as it lies there in the vault as a pledge—this system will set it free, and give so much added value to the gold, whatever it may be. The addition produced in the value of gold is a question to be left to the test of experiment.

It is plain that by this bill the total amount of the greenbacks the Government has promised to pay, and about the non-payment of which Mr. SCHURZ and others speak with such touching eloquence, will be redeemed to the entire satisfaction of the holders of every bill, and that in a space of time as short as is prudent to apply to a change so considerable. If these obligations of the Government are redeemed to the satisfaction of every holder thereof, who will there be that will have a right to say that there is any shade of dishonor upon the financial record of the United States? And that they will be thus paid is as certain as this law is enacted and goes into effect. The holders of them will pay them out in place of gold, and they will never see them again. They will pay them out at the same value of gold coin of the United States, and they will never again be seen. It is the neatest possible method of paying off indebtedness of the United States.

There is just one point in the speech of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] the other day to which I desire to call attention. He attributes many of the evils in trade, commerce, and enterprise to the fact that the currency was irredeemable. It is not surprising that the gentleman should have fallen into that error. It is the error of all men who lean upon the past exclusively for opinions. I should agree with him that the late condition of banking and suspension and partial bankruptcy was attributable in good measure, or at least had been extended, enlarged, and accelerated by the condition of the currency. But the feature of the currency in fault was not that it was irredeemable, but it was on account of its volume, its largely excessive volume as compared with the past. The gentleman states, in his very excellent and exhaustive speech, that in 1860 the amount of currency (meaning by "the currency" the circulating medium of all kinds) was $14.50 per capita of the people; whereas in 1873 he shows that it was $19 per capita, notwithstanding our great increase of population, and it was undoubtedly a great deal more. He did not stop to mention, as he probably would if he had desired to fortify that view of the case, that by the increased facility of exchange through express and by telegraph and other more perfect means of communication, the efficiency of the currency for the purposes that are legitimate as compared with 1860 was larger by 25 per cent., so that potentially our currency now, as compared with the currency of 1860, is something like $25 per capita as compared with the $14 and $15 per capita then in circulation.

Now, behold! Let us recall to mind the effect upon prices, upon speculation, upon enterprises that are unsound, upon enterprises that are premature, produced by this increase of currency from $15 per capita to $25 per capita during the last eleven years, and by it be admonished that if we want to continue the mischief and magnify the disaster, we must go on increasing the volume of the currency. We claim that it is clear as possible that it is the volume, and not the irredeemability, that has been the occasion of the phenomena. It has not been sufficiently noticed that the mischiefs of price and the panic grew in intensity out of the fact that, as soon as confidence was destroyed, the volume of the currency was rapidly reduced by hoarding. The panic and the mischiefs, as all bankers claim, were made by a perfect suspension on the part of the banks by refusing to redeem. The lock-up system of the currency arrested the disaster while it was in full flood. This is claimed on the part of the banks and all financiers. Now, let us see whether it was irredeemability that did the mischief, or whether it was not rather the excessive largeness of the currency that did the mischief, and that it was the rapid diminution of the volume in actual use that arrested it.

The bill provides that so far as customs duties are concerned the certificate is equivalent in value to gold. So far as other public dues are concerned, it is equivalent in value to bank-notes and greenbacks. What, then, would be the motive for refusing it? If a man with this currency, (which, it will be observed, takes the place of the present circulation by a prudent and gradual process,) desiring to buy a hundred barrels of flour, goes into Broad street, and some man, bitten by extraordinary devotion to the specie basis, or some politician, or some advocate of some other system, should refuse to sell his flour for this currency or should ask a higher price, the owner of the currency would walk across to the other side of the street, and have the flour rolled out promptly, right under the nose of the gentleman who had refused it.

The currency of the country must be such as fairly represents the business wants and the productive capacity of the country. We know now that a volume of currency measured by seven or eight hundred millions, is not too much for the future by the experience of the last ten or twelve years. Fix it at that, and then let it not be changed until the necessity for it, by reason of increase of population and business or for other causes, shall have been demonstrated; I do not mean demonstrated by clamoring newspapers or by public opinion, but demonstrated as scientific facts are—by absolute proof. Now the volume of our currency represents and the prices of all commodities are adjusted with reference to that standard. If it be the only standard, let it be reduced one-fourth in volume, and, by a process more or less rapid, the prices of all commodities, including labor, will be reduced. Let it be increased 25 per cent., and, by a pretty rapid process, the prices of all commodities that are measured by money in the country will increase 25 per cent. This is a certain law of supply and demand that is as reliable as the philosophic law that water seeks a lower level. No legislation can prevent the operation of that law, though it may possibly modify the methods of its action.

The volume of the currency and its uniformity of value are the great things to be secured. The volume of the present currency is large, and perhaps it would have been wise to have had a less amount issued; but it was established under the exigencies of the war, and prices of all commodities were established and adjusted thereto; and it would have been a cruel piece of financial legislation to have subjected it to a rapid or excessive diminution of volume, inasmuch as it would have produced a shrinkage of values that would have ruined thousands of citizens to the advantage of one one-hundredth of other citizens; in other words, brought about extensive bankruptcy. After having suffered the evils that result from the adjustment of all prices of all commodities to the enlarged volume of currency, and inasmuch as the volume of trade, and the volume of commodities, and the amount of production of intrinsic values, and the population of the country have grown immensely the last ten years, the volume is now such as is not unreasonably large, and such as ought not to be reduced; but future growth of population, and of production, and of commercial enterprises will be such, that the relation between the volume of currency and their volume will exert a constant tendency in favor of better financial conditions.

This is the feature much to be desired. If we expect and hope to retain our present hold upon the markets of the world, and extend our exportations of the products of our own industry to other countries, we should favor the policy which would reduce rather than increase the volume of currency as compared with the volume of our business, because it would have a general tendency to make our productions cheaper in cost, and therefore we could sell them cheaper to other countries.

We are forty million people, as has been said; and I can say that there are no forty millions on the face of the globe that produce so much wealth as we—that is to say, that have so large a margin of production over consumption as we have. These forty million people have the finest domain the sun shines upon, and the broadest; have more of the crude elements of wealth than any other hundred and forty million people; have more intelligence, more inventive genius, more energy; and the advantages of education, with the strength and efficiency that are created thereby, are more generally diffused than in any other country; add to this a disposition to better their condition by industry and frugality exceeding that of any other forty million people. On this continent there are in operation more completely all the laws of civilization that tend to enlarge the capacity and increase the prosperity of the people than anywhere else exist. It will be our own fault, it will be our crime, if, by unwise legislation, we put bars in the way of our excelsior movement, and put off for even a quarter of a century the time when the United States of America shall draw tribute from all other nations and peoples. Let me not be misunderstood. While I do not advocate a specie basis for a circulating medium or measure of value in the ordinary acceptation of the term, it should not be of less value than dollar for dollar as compared with the currency of the world. Under judicious rules and regulations there is every reason for assured conviction that the dollar of standard value money of the United States will be at least of equivalent purchasing value with a dollar in gold. It is clear that such a condition of the currency is indispensable in the long run for the best interests of the nation. It will be observed that any change proposed by this bill will be brought about very gradually and prudently. No change that contemplates a wide and sudden variance in our monetary system should for a moment be considered. Such a change might produce a shock to the business enterprises and industry of the country as would endanger a partial and perhaps a long-continued paralysis.

One of the most certain and injurious consequences of having the specie basis for the currency of the nation consists in the fact that in the exigencies of war, when the life of the nation is in peril, the specie basis system always fails. Readers of history cannot name an exception of a continued war of any considerable magnitude that did not compel the nation engaged in it to cut loose from specie basis and resort to government credit. No system or organization can claim to be sound that is not equal to the greatest exigency to which it may probably be exposed. The nation that leans upon a gold and silver basis for its currency, unless it is contemptible and unimportant on account of its weakness, will find the time when, depending upon a specie basis for its currency, it will lean upon a broken reed; and just when the nation most needs the specie currency is the time when it cannot have it. It is far better to have a sovereignty educate its people and itself to have a standard for a currency that hostile circumstances and foreign conditions, and even war and invasion, cannot touch; that shall be as reliable as its own sovereignty, and never fall except with that sovereignty; that fosters an interest in the national integrity and perpetuity and that will be bound up in all their private interests and the occurrences of every-day life.

What we want is a uniform currency, with a dollar in paper equivalent to a dollar in gold.

Mr. HAVENS asked and obtained leave to have printed in the RECORD remarks on national finances. [See Appendix.]

And then, on motion of Mr. FIELD, (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

Mr. SCOTT presented the petition of Henry Carey Baird and other citizens of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, praying for the redemption or conversion of the legal-tender notes, by issuing therefor, at the option of the holder, bonds payable on demand in legal-tender notes and bearing interest at some fixed rate, and suggesting 3.65 per cent. per annum; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Porter Township, Huntingdon County, Pennsylvania, praying for the repeal of section 2 of the act of June 6, 1872, which makes a reduction of 10 per cent. on certain import duties; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of William Williams, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, praying that a pension be allowed him; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland, presented the petition of Sterling, Ahrens & Co., Morton, Stewart & Co., and other merchants of Baltimore, Maryland, praying that mutual insurance societies may be placed on the same footing in all respects with individuals entitled to shares of the Geneva award for losses occasioned by depredations of rebel cruisers; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition and accompanying papers of Mrs. Sarah Graffum Glover, praying to be allowed a pension; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MITCHELL presented the petition of Caroline M. Purviance, of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, and Francis Wyeth, of Dauphin County, Pennsylvania, praying compensation for the use of, and destruction by, United States troops, of their property in Saint Joseph, Missouri; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. RAMSEY presented three petitions of citizens of Minnesota, praying the establishment of post-routes from Marshall, Minnesota, to Kampeska, Dell Rapids, and Oakwood, Dakota Territory; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. NORWOOD. At the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] who moved to reconsider the vote on the bill which passed a few days ago, removing the political disabilities of Thomas Hardeman, jr., I now ask leave to have his petition, praying for the removal of his political disabilities, filed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be received and laid upon the table.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the petition of Susan Ten Eyck Williamson, widow of the late Captain Charles L. Williamson, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition and accompanying papers of Belle E. Hammond, of Closter, Bergen County, New Jersey, praying remuneration for funeral expenses attending the death of her father, Rev. E. S. Hammond, who died on the 24th of May, 1873, at San Bernardino, California, while in the service of the United States as agent for the Indians of the Colorado River agency in the Territory of Arizona; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SARGENT presented a resolution of the Legislature of California, representing that the value of wheat exported from San Francisco during the last fiscal year was $10,453,414; that the value of jute bags and jute cloth imported in San Francisco to carry away the wheat was $1,449,575, upon which importation there was collected as customs duties $579,806, and praying the repeal of the duty on jute bags; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of the State Grange of the Patrons of Husbandry of California, praying for the repeal of the duty on jute sacks, or manufactured burlaps; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SARGENT. I also present a petition to Congress from citizens of Del Norte County, California, representing that the commerce of the coast of California suffers greatly year by year for the want of a harbor of refuge between San Francisco and Puget Sound; and they give some facts as to the commerce and the needs of commerce in that respect. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer a petition, very numerously signed by many respectable citizens of the District of Columbia, representing that the charter of the gas company requires only the laying of mains and supply-pipes, and makes no provision for the illuminating power and purity of the gas; that the gas supplied is notoriously inferior in illuminating power and of impure quality, emitting ammonia, sulphureted hydrogen, and other sulphur compounds deleterious to health. The memorialists pray that the charter of the company may be so amended that provision shall be made both for the illuminating power and the purity of the gas, and to that end that a superintendent of gas shall be appointed, and that it shall be his duty to act under the supervision of an honorary commission of referees, of whom two shall be persons of eminent scientific attainment, and one shall be a representative of the gas company; that they shall daily test the purity and the illuminating power of the gas, and make report thereon. I believe a similar subject has been referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, inasmuch as a large portion of the gas supplied by this company is furnished to Government offices. I therefore move that this memorial be referred to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER presented the petition of Charles H. Moseley, of Little Rock, Arkansas, praying for the pay of a second lieutenant from September 9, 1864, to April 12, 1865; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the memorial of George C. Richardson & Co. and others, merchants and business men of Boston, in reference to the distribution of the proceeds of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, under the customs-revenue laws; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LOGAN presented a petition of citizens of Illinois, in behalf of Abram Hoevener, late of the Second Regiment Mississippi Volunteers, colored, praying to be allowed the difference in pay between a sergeant and a second lieutenant; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the extension of the time of payment of preemption claims; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a petition of the council of the sub-Granges of Douglas County, Minnesota, praying Congress to extend the grant of land, which expired by limitation, for another reasonable term, to the Saint Cloud and Saint Vincent Branch of the Saint Paul and Pacific Railroad for the completion of their road through that county; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 127) for the relief of J. M. Stone, William M. Compton, and W. C. McAlexander, sureties on the bond of B. B. Emory, deceased, late collector of internal revenue of the third district of Mississippi, have directed me to report the same back adversely, and to ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and to say that, if the case has merits at all, it belongs, at all events in the first instance, to another tribunal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee will be discharged and the bill indefinitely postponed if there be no objection.

Mr. CONKLING. I am further directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 15) establishing the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, and for other purposes, to report it back adversely; that subject having been already disposed of.

COURTS IN IOWA.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 223) changing the times for holding certain district courts of the United States for the State of Iowa, have had the same under consideration, and instructed me to report it back with an amendment changing the time of holding courts at Council Bluffs from the third Tuesday in March and September to the fourth Monday. As this is a local bill, which it is important should be passed at once, I trust there will be no objection to its present consideration.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that, instead of the times now fixed by law, the terms of the district courts of the United States for the district of Iowa, to be held in the city of Keokuk and the city of Council Bluffs, shall commence at Keokuk on the third Tuesday of January and the third Tuesday of June, and at Council Bluffs on the third Tuesday of March and the third Tuesday of September, in each year.

The amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was to strike out the words "third Tuesday," in the eighth line, and insert the words "fourth Monday."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

It was ordered that the amendment be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WRIGHT. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 8) changing the time for holding certain district courts of the United States for the State of Iowa, being on the same subject as the House bill just passed, have instructed me to report it back and move its indefinite postponement.

The motion was agreed to.

MAIL SERVICE TO THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

Mr. SARGENT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be directed to inquire into the present condition of the mail service between the United States and the Sandwich Islands, and report to the Senate whether such service is now performed by the contractors therefor, and whether any legislation is necessary for the continuance of such service hereafter.

ABOLITION OF INTERNAL-REVENUE OFFICES.

Mr. WRIGHT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be instructed to inquire into the expediency of abolishing "the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue," as provided by the act of January 13, 1866, and all acts amendatory thereof, as well as all the offices connected therewith, or such of said offices as, in their opinion, may be dispensed with; and devolving the duties thereof upon other Bureaus or clerks under the Department of the Treasury.

NAVY-YARDS AND NAVAL HOSPITALS.

Mr. STEVENSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the number of navy-yards and of naval hospitals, and report by bill.

MAIL CONTRACTS.

Mr. SCOTT. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be requested to communicate to the Senate a statement showing how many of the contractors for the transportation of the mails on public routes having contracts on the 30th of June last, had contracts for more than five of such routes allotted to them; how many of those in such cases were given out to sub-contractors, the prices at which they were allotted to the contractors; and also, so far as known to the Department or ascertainable from the accounts, the prices at which sub-contractors were paid; also whether there is reason to believe that a class of professional bidders has grown up who seek to obtain control of numerous routes by underbidding bona fide contractors, and then sub-letting to them at a profit; and whether legislation is needed to enable the Department to secure the services of bona fide contractors at the lowest price by refusal, under proper regulations, to allot contracts to such professional bidders.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think that resolution will impose a great deal of labor upon the Post-Office Department if the Department shall attempt to comply with it. Let it lie over one day.

Mr. SCOTT. I have no objection, if the Senator wishes to consider it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution will lie over.

REPORTING OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be directed to contract, on behalf of the Senate, with a suitable person to report, for publication in the official record provided for the purpose, the debates and proceedings of the Senate during the sessions of the Forty-third Congress, on the terms allowed by the act entitled "An act making appropriations to pay for reporting the debates and proceedings of Congress," approved January 28, 1874.

I intended to ask the present consideration of that resolution, but as the chairman of the Committee on Printing is not present, I ask that it lie over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 1400) for the relief of William H. Vesey;

A bill (H. R. No. 1401) granting a pension to Penelope T. Heald;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 43) authorizing a special court of inquiry concerning General O. O. Howard; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 45) tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain Benjamin Gleadell, officers, and crew, of the steamship Atlantic, of the White Star line, for saving the brigantine Scotland in mid-ocean.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the concurrent resolution of the House directing the Congressional Printer to furnish to each Senator, Member of the House of Representatives, and Delegate twenty-four copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BENJAMIN F. BUTLER of Massachusetts, Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, and Mr. WILLIAM G. DONNAN of Iowa, conferees on the part of the House.

MARCUS OTTERBOURG.

Mr. SCHURZ. I desire to call up the motion to reconsider the vote of the Senate on the bill (S. No. 169) for the relief of Marcus Otterbourg, late consul of the United States at the city of Mexico and minister to the republic of Mexico—the motion made by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] with whose permission I call it up now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill indicated by him for the purpose of disposing of the motion to reconsider.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the motion to reconsider the vote passing this bill.

Mr. SCHURZ. The bill provides for the relief of Marcus Otterbourg, late consul of the United States at the city of Mexico and minister to the republic of Mexico, who asks for compensation for the time during which he served as minister. A statement was made by the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] after the bill had passed, that Mr. Otterbourg had been nominated as secretary of legation in 1867, and that the nomination was then rejected. The fact, as stated by the Senator from New York, is correct, but, as will appear, it does not affect the merits of this case. Mr. Otterbourg was appointed minister to Mexico during the recess of the Senate, a fact which was not mentioned in the debate when we had the bill up last. The Senate took a recess on the 20th of April, 1867, to meet again on the 1st of July, 1867. On the 21st of June, during the recess of the Senate, the following telegram was sent by the State Department to General J. B. Stedman, collector of customs at New Orleans:

> Please forward two copies of the following, one by way of Matamoras, and the other by way of Vera Cruz, to Marcus Otterbourg, United States consul, city of Mexico:
> You have been appointed United States minister to the republic of Mexico; you will act without a commission until you receive one, but a commission will be sent to you in the course of a week.
> F. W. SEWARD,
> Acting Secretary.

Mr. SHERMAN. Was that after or before the rejection?

Mr. SCHURZ. Before. It was during the recess of the Senate. Then after the Senate had met, it seems the State Department reconsidered its action in this case, and the name of General McClernand was sent in for the office of minister to Mexico, and the name of Mr. Otterbourg for secretary of legation; and there is on the records of the State Department a dispatch, dated August 15, 1867, in which Mr. Seward informs Mr. Otterbourg that the President has thought it expedient to nominate Mr. McClernand minister to Mexico, and Mr. Otterbourg secretary, but both having been rejected by the Senate, Mr. Otterbourg is informed that his functions as minister are to end, and that he is to turn over the legation to Mr. Plumb. It further appears that Mr. Otterbourg continued to send dispatches to the State Department until September 20, and that this dispatch, in which he acknowledges the receipt of the dispatch of August 15, is dated October 1. So it appears that Mr. Otterbourg claims compensation during the time he acted as minister, appointed by the Government during the recess of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire when the vacancy occurred in the mission to Mexico, which this gentleman claims to have filled?

Mr. SCHURZ. As I understand it occurred before the appointment was made; if I remember correctly, Mr. Corwin resigning.

Mr. CONKLING. At what date?

Mr. SCHURZ. I do not remember exactly the date.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it was some time before.

Mr. MORTON. Did he not die before?

Mr. SCHURZ. I do not remember that. What I have been reading are copies of dispatches, as I took them from the records of the State Department.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was inclined to vote for this bill, but did not vote because I wanted to examine the facts. What I wish to know is, whether Mr. Otterbourg, at the time and during the time for which he claims this compensation, knew that his name had been submitted to the Senate and had been rejected. That is the point.

Mr. SCHURZ. As I just stated, he was appointed during the recess of the Senate. After the Senate had met, the State Department reconsidered its action in this case, and sent in the name of General McClernand for minister and of Mr. Otterbourg for secretary of legation; but both were rejected. Then, on the 15th of August, Mr. Seward informed Mr. Otterbourg that——

Mr. SHERMAN. He was rejected for secretary and not for minister.

Mr. SCHURZ. He was informed that the President had deemed it expedient to nominate Mr. McClernand; but during all that time Mr. Otterbourg acted as minister.

Mr. SHERMAN. He was rejected, then, for secretary and not for minister.

Mr. SCHURZ. Exactly.

Mr. CONKLING. If I could find the report, which some Senator has taken from the table, I should like to say one word.

Mr. SCHURZ. Here it is, [handing the report to Mr. CONKLING.]

Mr. CONKLING. It will be observed, first, that the Senate acted favorably upon this bill on the strength of a report read from the desk, which report, we were told, was made twice by the Committee on Foreign Relations. The report stated, as the ground on which the Senate acted, that "on June 21, 1867, Mr. Otterbourg was nominated by the President minister plenipotentiary and envoy extraordinary of the United States to the republic of Mexico. The Senate adjourned on July 21, 1867, without having confirmed the nomination." Stopping there, we find now that the fact is precisely otherwise. On the day here mentioned Mr. Otterbourg was nominated for secretary of legation to Mexico.

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator will allow me to say that I think he is mistaken there. He, Mr. Otterbourg, was nominated for secretary o' legation on the 20th day of July, the day before the Senate adjourned.f

Mr. CONKLING. I think I can satisfy the Senator in that regard. He was nominated on the 19th of July. This report says that the Senate adjourned on the 21st of July, 1867, without having confirmed the nomination of Mr. Otterbourg. My statement is that, having been nominated the day before this date, and nominated for secretary of legation, he was rejected by the Senate; and here I have the record which, although it is in executive session, I have the right for this purpose to refer to, as I speak of it merely in reference to his nomination and rejection—two facts to which I believe the injunction of secrecy does not apply. Therefore I say that this report is entirely without a leg to stand upon.

We are now asked to refuse to reconsider the bill upon another state of facts, given us by the Senator from Missouri; and I want for one moment to take the facts as he states them and see whether, assuming exactly what the Senator says, there is any way in which by law this money can be paid.

This happened in 1867. On the 3d of March, 1867, the tenure of office act was enacted; and the facts, as I understand them in this recital by the Senator, bring this case precisely within the inhibition of this statute. Here was an office in which vacancy had occurred either by the death or resignation of Mr. Corwin, which had continued for a long time. It had been a vacancy existing in the presence of the Senate; and it appears now that the then President of the United States having nominated Mr. McClernand and I think somebody else, and having failed to obtain the consent and receive the advice of the Senate to their appointment, after the Senate had adjourned proceeded to do that which the law says cannot be done, applying both to the claimant here and to the President. If, then, this claim is to be put upon that ground, I inquire by what process it is that we are to assume, first, that the President of the United States did not know the law or that he violated the law; that Mr. Otterbourg did not know the law or that he violated the law; and now that we are bound to violate the law by paying a claimant for holding an office which the statute expressly makes it impossible for him to hold?

Mr. SCHURZ. May I interrupt the Senator from New York right there?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. SCHURZ. I think he is mistaken on one point. Mr. Otterbourg was not appointed after he had been rejected by the Senate by any means; but he was appointed during the recess of the Senate, between the 30th of April and the first Tuesday of July. Mr. Otterbourg's name had not been in the Senate at all at that time, but he was appointed to fill a vacancy which had occurred through the resignation, as I understand, of Mr. Corwin, during the recess of the Senate. That is as I understand the case.

Mr. CONKLING. I was aware that I did not state my point very clearly, and I am confirmed now by the fact that the honorable Senator from Missouri seems not to have apprehended it at all. Perhaps if I read a section of the tenure of office act it will assist me in bringing to the notice of the Senate the thing which I am trying to make plain:

And be it further enacted, That the President shall have power to fill all vacancies which may happen during the recess of the Senate, by reason of death or resignation, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session thereafter.

So that, stopping there for a moment, Mr. Corwin having died or resigned, the President had the power during that recess to issue a commission which would live as long as the next session of the Senate should live. That is not this case, because that vacation passed by. Now, observe the next provision of the statute:

And if no appointment, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be made to such office so vacant—

That is this case—

or temporarily filled as aforesaid—

That is, by assigning an agent to fill it where there is a removal on charges—during such next session of the Senate, such office shall remain in abeyance, without any salary, fees, or emoluments attached thereto, until the same shall be filled by appointment thereto, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and during such time all the powers and duties belonging to such office shall be exercised by such other officer as may by law exercise such powers and duties in case of a vacancy in such office.

Can any man draw a section now to meet this case more exactly than that section meets it? Here was the instance of an office which had become vacant, the Senator says, in the recess of the Senate. I have not stopped to inquire how that is. Grant it; in the recess of the Senate; then what was the prerogative of the President? To proceed to issue a commission, which commission should live as long as the next session of the Senate, and die absolutely on an adjournment day. That he did not do. There is no pretense that he did it. What did he do? Exercising another branch of his faculty in respect to it, he sent here a nomination, and it is said a second nomination at the succeeding session of the Senate, both of which nominations were rejected. Then the statute takes hold of the case; and what does it say? It names this particular case, and directs that that office, which has thus been slighted by the President, which he has failed to fill as alone he might fill it by law, shall remain, in the language of the law, 'in abeyance;" nobody shall receive its salary. What shall become of its duties? They shall devolve upon that officer who, under the other laws of the United States, becomes the locum tenens in such a case. Who was that? It was in one case the secretary of legation; absent the secretary of legation, it was the consul; and it came to this claimant, he being consul, and the law fixing his fees; and now the simple proposition, as I understand it, is, that in the very teeth of this statute we shall proceed to give this claimant this money which has once been voted by the Senate upon a statement of facts confessed now to be utterly without foundation.

Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate about this case. I need not say that it does not concern me any more than it does any other Senator. I do not know this claimant. I knew nothing about the case until it was presented; and I rise to make this objection with a full consciousness of the very unenviable part that any member of this body plays who rises to object to money being paid out of the Treasury, and particularly in an instance where somebody is eager to receive it. I heard some Senator remark the other day "This was a very small matter; it was only three or four thousand dollars." I believe that is all it is—three or four thousand dollars in gold. It is a small matter.

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senator from Massachusetts estimates it at about $800.

Mr. CONKLING. Now it has been cut down to $800, but if it will assist the argument I will divide that by two, and I will make it $400. The principle at stake here does not depend upon the amount. If this man has a claim of $4,000 or $40,000, and it is due him, he ought to be paid. If he makes a claim of four shillings or four pence which is not owing by the Government he ought not to be paid. Who are we, that we measure by dollars and cents our duty in a case of this sort? We are merely trustees. We are not voting our own money; we are administering the trust funds of the nation; and, as I understand the duties applicable to trustees administering trust funds, they are not to say, "Why, this is a small matter; if it was my own money I might feel disposed to give it away; this is so little a thing we can be generous." They are bound at all times to be just, and to walk by that rule laid down by the Constitution and the laws. Here is one set of statutes forbidding double salaries. Here is another statute which, if it devolved the duties of this office upon this man as consul, provided in so many words that he should do it for his salary as consul, and that the salary proposed in this bill should not be received by him or by anybody else. That is the whole case.

Mr. SCHURZ. Mr. President, I need not say that as to the duty we have to fulfill in this case I agree perfectly with the Senator from New York; we ought not to pay a dollar unless it is due; but where a man has a just claim, we ought to pay it. As to the Senator's statement of facts, I do not know whether I clearly understood him. As I understand the case, this gentleman was appointed during the recess of the Senate, a thing which the President had a perfect right to do. According to the tenure of office act his commission was to expire on the day of the adjournment of the Senate at its next session; that is to say, in this case, on the 21st of July. That the President had a right to appoint him during the recess of the Senate nobody questions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will allow me, that depends upon how the vacancy occurred. If the President, between the 20th and 21st of April, when we last adjourned, and the 3d of July, when we again met, accepted the resignation of——who was it?

Mr. SCHURZ. I think it was Mr. Corwin.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is again laboring under a mistake, or somebody is, because the nomination of this gentleman was in the place of Lewis D. Campbell, resigned.

Mr. SCHURZ. Yes; that is so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, then, I ask my friend, if Campbell had resigned before the Senate took its recess on the 20th of April, whether under the tenure of office act the President would have had a right to fill it?

Mr. SCHURZ. As I am informed, he had resigned very shortly before this appointment was made; but I cannot give the dates, I will admit that. But now taking this state of the case, the commission expired on the 21st of July, the day on which the Senate adjourned, and nobody will question that if the appointment was right, this gentleman is entitled to the salary which he claims; he was rightfully appointed and he rightfully held that office.

It is very well known to the Senate that in the case of diplomatic officers there is always a lapping over in the discharge of diplomatic duties and the drawing of salaries, as between the officer who goes out and the one who comes in. We may, for instance, confirm a nominee, say for the mission to Spain, on a certain day. At the same time there is a minister of the United States at Madrid. He will not surrender the legation to the new incumbent until that incumbent arrives there, and he will draw the salary of that office in the mean time. That has always been so, and cannot be otherwise, and this case is similar.

If anything can be said against the Administration, it is that Mr. Seward did not inform Mr. Otterbourg of the action of the Senate in this case as soon as he ought to have done; but that was not Mr. Otterbourg's fault. It was a time of great emergency in Mexico. The Administration thought it was absolutely necessary to have somebody there to take care of the diplomatic interests of the United States. Mr. Otterbourg did assume the duties of that office, and I do not know that anybody would have thought well of him if upon the first rumor of the action of the Senate concerning him, without having received official information, he had run away and left that office to take care of itself.

Mr. CONKLING. What action of the Senate does the Senator refer to?

Mr. SCHURZ. The Senate having adjourned without confirming him as minister to Mexico.

Mr. CONKLING. He never was nominated as minister to Mexico.

Mr. SCHURZ. He was appointed during the recess of the Senate, and for a time he held the office under a commission given him by the Government of the United States.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator has twice repeated that there might have been some fault on the part of the Secretary of State in not informing this claimant of what the Senate had done. I do not understand what the Senator means by that. The fact, as I understand it, is that this man never was nominated as minister to the Senate at all. He was nominated as secretary of legation and rejected the next day. What facts, therefore, could the Secretary of State communicate to him?

Mr. SCHURZ, I have already stated the facts in the case. This gentleman was appointed by the President on the 21st of June, and was officially informed of his appointment by the Secretary of State. Then on the 15th of August Mr. Seward informed him by dispatch that the President had deemed it expedient to nominate General McClernand minister to Mexico and himself secretary of legation, but both being rejected, he, Mr. Otterbourg, should surrender his office to Mr. Plumb. When Mr. Otterbourg got that dispatch he acted accordingly; so that literally he held this office and discharged its duties under the commission given to him by the President and until he was informed that he had no longer the right to hold it; and it is for that period that he claims compensation, and I think he is justly and equitably entitled to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to make a suggestion to my friend from Missouri, of course in an entirely friendly spirit, for his consideration; and that is whether he has any objection to this bill being recommitted to the Committee on Foreign Relations, to get at the exact facts, and have a report from them to us.

I see by the Blue Book that all this time the officer whom the law designates as entitled to exercise this function in the absence of a lawful minister, the secretary of legation, was there on the spot and being paid his salary—Mr. Plumb. Now, if Mr. Plumb was there all this time and doing these duties, it would furnish a very serious reason for stopping on that point. I do not know that he was. The difficulty is, if the Senator will pardon me, that we are not perfectly advised of what the truth really is. We do not know when Campbell resigned; we do not know when he left his station; we do not know how long Plumb staid there, and all that. Now, has the Senator any objection to have an investigation of this by the committee to get at the detailed history of all these facts? Will my friend tell me?

Mr. SCHURZ. The committee has investigated the case three times, and here are the facts. What the Senator says about Mr. Plumb being present as the secretary of legation does not militate against this case at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does my friend object to the bill being recommitted to the committee?

Mr. SCHURZ. I have no particular objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then, if the Senator has no objection, I hope we may vote on that motion and not waste any more time, but send the bill back to get a detailed report; for certainly this bill, as my friend admits, does not state the case as he himself now understands it to be.

Mr. SCHURZ. This report states the case perfectly. It only omits one point, and that is that he was nominated by the President during the recess of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the most unfortunate omission; that concerns the whole case. Here we had the Senate in session almost all the time during the summer. The Senate went away from here on the 21st of April, came back on the 3d of July, and then continued until the 21st of July, and again came back in November; and now I find by the Blue Book that down to the 30th of September Mr. Plumb was the secretary of legation at Mexico, and was paid for it. Then I find that the President of the United States undertook to recall Mr. Plumb by sending in the nomination of this gentleman as secretary of legation in place of Plumb, recalled; and he sent in the other gentleman in the place of Campbell, resigned. Now, if Campbell resigned, then the duties fell upon Plumb, recalled, and the President of the United States neither by the Constitution nor by the tenure of office bill—both of which were in force then and now—had any right to recall Plumb except under certain circumstances that are specified in the statute; and the Senate having investigated that subject declared that Plumb should not be recalled, and rejected this man Otterbourg who it was proposed should be put in his place. How did that leave it? That left on the 21st of July, when we again adjourned, Mr. Edwin L. Plumb the lawful secretary of legation of the United States at that place, charged with the performance of its duties, and the President had no more constitutional power then to turn him out and put this man in to perform any duty than I had myself. There is the difficulty.

But, as I said, I do not want to go over this case in a half-hour speech in detail, to show how this matter stands, so far as we now have the papers—and we have not yet got the important fact of when Campbell resigned and came back—and I only ask in the name of fairness and a perfect understanding of this subject that it may go back to the committee, that we may get all these dates, in order that we may do justice to this gentleman, whatever it may be.

Mr. SCHURZ. Now, in one respect the Senator misapprehends the facts very glaringly. Mr. Otterbourg was not put in place of Mr. Plumb by the President on the 21st of June at all. He was not then nominated for secretary of the legation. He was appointed as minister to Mexico, and the presence of a secretary of legation at a place does not prevent the nomination of a minister. So that the nomination made by the President of Mr. Otterbourg as minister to Mexico did not conflict with Mr. Plumb's presence there a bit.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is perfectly true, and I have said nothing to the contrary; but I say when the Senate of the United States declined to have Mr. Otterbourg as minister to Mexico, or as secretary, because the President keeping his name a secret from us as ever having been appointed minister at all, his commission would expire as minister on the 21st of July, supposing that he had been lawfully appointed in the first place, which even my friend does not know to this day, because he does not know when Mr. Campbell resigned. There we are, then.

Then we come to the 21st of July; this man ceasing to be minister—ceasing to be minister because the Constitution declared that his office should cease on that day, for the Senate had not confirmed the nomination made in the recess. Then he was out of office; and there was Plumb, whom the President had undertaken to recall, who the Senate declared should not be recalled, the secretary of legation. Who then, I should be glad to know, was entitled to the papers and to perform the functions of the office? Not Mr. Otterbourg, whom the representatives of the States had rejected under the Constitution, but Mr. Plumb, who they declared should not be recalled, and who was the chief officer of the legation there. So that if anybody, on this state of the case, is entitled to extra compensation from the 21st of July, it is Mr. Plumb, and not Mr. Otterbourg.

But, as I said, I do not want to begin with this case in its historic order and go all over it again, as if it were to be tried out now, because I understand my friend has no substantial objection to its being recommitted and our getting a historical detail of the case.

Mr. SCHURZ. I do not care for the case at all, except that justice be done.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is all I care for.

Mr. SCHURZ. But I maintain also that all the facts necessary for a decision of the case are before the Senate now with the exception of the date of the resignation of Mr. Campbell, and I think that must be in this report also.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; if my friend objects to the case going back to the committee, I shall ask the permission of the Senate to go through with it in order, because I do not know how his objection may strike other Senators. If he is unwilling to have the subject recommitted, when he confesses himself that he does not know one fact about it which is of the utmost importance, we had better look into it a little ourselves.

As the Senator from New York has stated, the law declares that the President had no right to make a vacancy in the office of minister to Mexico, between the 20th of April and the 3d of July, except in the way pointed out by law. The law provided that if there was a resignation or a death the President might fill the vacancy. There was not a resignation, because we have here the nomination of the President himself recalling Mr. Plumb, who was the secretary who had not resigned. We have in the nomination of the President a statement that Mr. Campbell had resigned, it is true; but we begin then on the date when this name was sent in, with the fact that there was not a vacancy in the office of secretary of legation at this place, and we begin also with the fact that the Senator confesses that he does not know at what time Mr. Campbell resigned and came home.

If Mr. Campbell resigned and came home before the 20th of April, or sent in his resignation and did not come home, but waited for his successor, the President had no right to appoint this man at all, because the law says so. He should have sent the appointment to the Senate while it was in session, in order that their judgment might be taken upon it. But we find that when the back of the Senate was turned away from Washington in these hurrying times, President Johnson was busy with his appointments. He was making up a fresh campaign to run himself upon, I suppose, as President; and everybody who had been in office before was to be turned out who did not "Johnsonize," as it was called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont will suspend. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which is the resolution offered by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] upon which the Senator from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope my friend will yield for the present.

Mr. MORTON. I waive my right for the present.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want this matter disposed of.

As I was saying, the Senator from Missouri states himself, and his report too, I believe, that he does not know this important fact upon which the right of the President to make this appointment at all turned; and that is, whether on the 21st of June Mr. Campbell had just resigned, or whether he had resigned before that time when the Senate being in session could have filled the vacancy. He does not know that. Now, is it not important as a precedent, is it not important to justice that the Senate should be informed as to what the truth was, so as to know whether the President of the United States was violating his functions, the consequence of which is to be that we are to pay money out of the Treasury to make it good? Is it not important to know it in order to know whether the President in doing this action and this man in receiving it were acting in good faith?

My friend thinks from this report, which he has read from, that it appears that Mr. Campbell did not resign until after the 20th of April, 1867, and this is the clause upon which he founds that; he is stated to have written a letter from New Orleans in April, 1867, "to the Mexican secretary for foreign affairs requesting humane treatment of Maximilian in case of his capture." Why, Mr. President, it is according to my recollection—but it is vague, and that is why I wish to have the bill returned to this committee to find out the truth—that Mr. Campbell having been upon the coast of Mexico, as this report states, resigned on that coast to proceed homeward, sent his resignation from Mexico, to which place he had attempted to go, and reached the coast as this report says. If so, he resigned long before the 20th of April, 1867; and I have not the slightest doubt that it will turn out as a fact (and that is why I wish my friend to reinvestigate this case, because his interest and mine are exactly alike) that Mr. Campbell did resign that office in the winter of 1867, in my opinion before the 4th of March, and then came back to New Orleans, where he remained awhile and wrote this letter, and the President left this mission to be vacant with the secretary of legation there, a very competent man, Plumb, until the 20th of June, when this commission was issued.

Mr. SCHURZ. If the Senator from Vermont will permit me, I will make a suggetion to him. The only question of fact at issue between us is the date of the resignation of Mr. Campbell. I maintain that, according to this report, or rather according to the letter of Mr. Seward contained in this report, Mr. Campbell must have resigned after April, 1867; for in the month of April he, as minister to Mexico, addressed to the Mexican government a letter "requesting humane treatment for Maximilian in case of his capture." It is absolutely impossible that he could have addressed that letter except in the quality of minister of the United States to the Mexican government. But, if the Senator from Vermont is willing to let this matter go over without referring it back to the committee, this being the only question of fact in issue between us, that can be very easily obtained, and I shall be able to answer his question to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it could have been very easily ascertained, it is of considerable importance to inquire why the committee did not ascertain it and report it. We ought to have had that fact as the very foundation of this inquiry.

But, Mr. President, this is not the only issue of fact, if my friend will pardon me, if he calls it an issue. I am not at issue with anybody. I am only endeavoring to protect the interests of the United States, so far as I can consistently with justice to this gentleman; and in order to do both it is necessary to know all the facts. Another matter of fact that I should be glad to be informed about—perhaps it appears in this report somewhere, but I do not see it—is what became of Mr. Edwin L. Plumb, who was recalled by the President of the United States, as he calls it, on the 19th of July.

Mr. SCHURZ. I can inform the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am speaking now of the report, but I should be glad if the Senator can inform me. I should like to know it.

Mr. SCHURZ. It appears from a dispatch addressed by Mr. Seward to Mr. Otterbourg on the 15th of August that he informs him of the rejection of General McClernand and Mr. Otterbourg as minister and secretary of legation respectively, and requested him to turn over the legation to Mr. Plumb, who had continued to be secretary of legation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I learn from my friend's statement that after this action of the Senate the legation was directed to be turned over to Mr. Plumb. Now let us see if it was necessary that any order should be sent to turn the legation over to Mr. Plumb. As I have shown, and as my friend from New York has shown still more clearly, the law had provided, and the Constitution had provided, in the first place, that this man's functions as minister, for which he now claims pay, terminated by the Constitution of his country on the 21st of July, 1867, and the commission by which he had exercised the authority before, even if it were lawful, told him, if he was fit to be a representative of any country, that that commission would only run until the next meeting of the Senate, which would carry it through to the end of the session. Therefore he knew that his functions must necessarily cease at the expiration of the session of the Senate, unless he was confirmed. He had no right to assume in advance that he would be confirmed. He had been thrust in there by the President of the United States as a favorite of his when the Senate had refused to appoint him, because the President had not brought him in to us before he had been thrust in there over Mr. Plumb, with whom the legation had been left in charge, and who was a perfectly competent person to discharge the office. Whether this appointment by the President was rightful or wrongful, we do not know. He was put in in the absence of the Senate, when there was a vacancy—in my opinion when the Senate had adjourned; and he knew by the commission that he held that he had no right to stay beyond the end of the next meeting of the Senate, unless he should be confirmed. Then what do we find? Why, that the President of the United States conceals his friend's name from the Senate in that capacity entirely, and sends him in as secretary of legation to take the place of the man whose functions he had assumed, in my opinion contrary to law, if the fact turns out to be as I think it will. And then, forsooth, he must be paid until he waits and finds out that Mr. Plumb has got a right to take possession of the legation, where he is all the time, and where he had a lawful right to be all the time, and where the Senate had said he should stay all the time, out of the Treasury of the United States. That is drawing it a little too fine.

What do we find next, if we are to go through this thing? We find from this report that this man, probably believing that if he came to the Senate in the usual way for redress he would have a hard road to travel, stands upon the law; and that is where I am perfectly willing he should stand, and whatever he is lawfully entitled to he ought to have. He stands upon the law, and instead of turning his face toward us he turns it to that tribunal in the lower part of the Capitol, that is authorized to do justice to all citizens who have contracts and claims against the United States; and we find that the Court of Claims allowed him $85.80 for exercising diplomatic functions from the 19th of August to the 9th of September, 1867. Why did not the Court of Claims allow him for all he was entitled to? They did allow him for all they thought he was entitled to, because the Senator will find, I think, (although I do not state it positively,) that this gentleman's petition against the United States in the Court of Claims covered every ground of claim that he had, and that he demanded all the compensation which he thought himself entitled to from the 19th of June until the 9th of September, and the Court of Claims allowed him only so much. Am I right about that?

Mr. SCHURZ. Yes, sir; but does the Senator know upon what grounds?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; but I say the committee ought to have told us.

Mr. SCHURZ. It is stated in the report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us see; the report says:

> The First Comptroller, however, deducted all allowance to him as consul in charge of legation and as minister, but admitted and certified the salary of consul. The case was taken to the Court of Claims, where judgment was rendered for $85.80 for exercising diplomatic functions from the 19th of August to the 9th of September, 1867, in addition to a further sum due for his services as consul. The court refused to allow salary as minister on the technical objection that Mr. Otterbourg took his oath of office before the consul-general of Switzerland, whose authority for that purpose does not appear. There was, however, no one else before whom he could have taken the oath, unless he had returned to Washington for that purpose; and, furthermore, the Department of State regarded him as minister and promised him compensation as such.

I will venture to hazard a guess—and it is only a guess—that if my friend will look at the report of the Court of Claims and will look into the papers, he will find that the judgment of the Court of Claims was upon a somewhat broader ground than that this gentleman failed to take the oath of office before the right person, because my knowledge of that court is so great, and my respect for it so great, that I cannot imagine the Court of Claims to have decided that this gentleman had either a legal or moral claim for services as minister of the United States under the circumstances as they now appear to be, which are, that Mr. Campbell had resigned his office before the Senate went away, and that this man's name was never sent to us for confirmation at all.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President——

MAIL-BID DEPOSITS.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator from Indiana kindly yields to me for a few moments, and I will ask the attention of the Senate to a matter that needs prompt action, and will ask that the bill which I hold in my hand be now considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a bill, informally laying aside the pending order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the bill be read for information.

Mr. SARGENT. I will state the reason for the bill.

Leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 417) relating to certain deposits in the Post-Office Department; and it was read as follows:

> Be it enacted, &c., That whenever any person who has made a bid, or hereafter may make a bid, for carrying the mails of the United States, shall so request in writing, it shall be the duty of the Postmaster-General to collect the check or draft that may have been deposited with such bid, and deposit the proceeds with the Treasurer of the United States, to be repaid by the Treasurer of the United States to such bidder upon the certificate of the Postmaster-General that such payment should be made.

Mr. SARGENT. The difficulty which this bill is intended to meet is just this: by the law which we passed in 1873, now for the first time coming into operation, it was required that every person bidding for mail service should deposit a certified check or draft upon some national bank for all above the amount of $5,000 of the previous service. The result is, that from one to three or four hundred thousand dollars in the shape of certified checks on national banks are now deposited in the hands of the Postmaster-General. The bidders, knowing that these national banks too frequently fail, are anxious for the safety of this money. By the law and the ruling of the Department these certified checks are to remain in the hands of the Postmaster-General until next July, so that there is an opportunity during six months for the failure of these banks, and this amount to be lost to these persons who have made the deposit, and which by the theory of the law is to be returned to them by the Postmaster-General.

This bill proposes that the Postmaster-General, upon the request in writing of any one of these persons so bidding, shall collect this money and pay it into the Treasury of the United States. The bidders are willing to trust the Treasury of the United States. They think the money will be properly safe there. They do not ask that they be released from making such deposits, but they do ask that the money shall be safe, because if the money is lost there will be no reclamation on the United States, or perhaps a mere equitable consideration that as the United States had forced then to accept the credit of these national banks it should make good the loss which might thereby occur; but there is no strict legal right or claim upon the Government of the United States. This bill will simply change this paper from being a mere certified check of a national bank into a deposit in the Treasury of the United States at the request of the parties who deposit the check, to be held there as now provided by law, to be paid out when the Postmaster-General shall certify to the Treasurer of the United States that the amount ought to be paid to these parties. I trust there will be no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. Allow me to ask the Senator whether the bill has been referred to any committee?

Mr. SARGENT. It has not. But I will state that since last Friday there has been deposited with the Postmaster-General the large amount that I speak of, under the law of 1873. Unless some relief is granted, these parties are compelled to trust to the credit of the national banks for this amount of money, who may take occasion to fail on this account, or may fail from other causes. They ought to have relief; and it is in order that they may have relief as soon as possible that I propose this bill.

Mr. STEVENSON. I will suggest to the Senator that the only difficulty I have about it is, that I think it ought to go to a committee, so that we may know how much it will increase the expenditure for additional clerks in the Treasury Department.

Mr. MORTON. I am satisfied that this bill will lead to discussion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire that this bill may be referred to the Committee on Finance. I am familiar with the subject; but there are two amendments of an important character that ought to be made to the bill. I do not care to state them now.

Mr. SARGENT. As my friend from Indiana desires to proceed with his remarks I will allow the bill to be referred; but I hope we shall hear from it at an early day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be considered as read twice and referred to the Committee on Finance.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that it had appointed Mr. R. MILTON SPEER a conferee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives directing the Congressional Printer to furnish to each Senator, Member of the House of Representatives, and Delegate, twenty-four copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in place of Mr. S. J. RANDALL, excused.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH.

Mr. RAMSEY. At the instance of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, I ask for an order for the printing of the arguments and evidence taken before that committee on the subject of the postal telegraph.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Ought not that motion to be referred to the Committee on Printing?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rules the Chair thinks it is excepted, being a motion to print by order of a standing committee of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. MORTON on the 26th of January, as follows:

Resolved, That the credentials of Hon. P. B. S. Pinchback be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections; that the committee have power to send for persons and papers, and be instructed to inquire into the conduct of said Pinchback in connection with said election.

[Mr. MORTON addressed the Senate, concluding the speech begun by him on Friday last. His speech in full will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I rise principally to dissent from the proposition stated by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. CARPENTER,] that the President of the United States, in sending troops to Louisiana, acted without authority of law, and, as a necessary conclusion, contrary to law. The disorderly violence which had existed in Louisiana had become a reproach to the nation and an outrage to humanity. Public attention had been called to the lawless violence which there existed, and apprehensions prevailed that they would be repeated; and the order-loving people of the country rejoiced when they found that the firm hand of the President had taken charge of matters in that State. The President averted the pending evil; saved bloodshed; preserved peace; and if he acted contrary to law our Government is a much less perfect system than it has been considered.

Mr. President, the object of all government is order, peace, tranquillity. The province and the purpose of all executive power is by the enforcement of law to suppress violence. Our Government is no exception, for we have stamped it upon the very door-posts of our nation that this is a government of order. The preamble to the Constitution says that—

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, &c., do ordain and establish this Constitution.

The end that the President accomplished was the very object for which our Government was instituted. We did not only place it in the preamble, but we gave it a prominent place in the body of the Constitution itself. We provided in the fourth section of the fourth article that—

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government.

That clause has been read many times in this debate without having attention directed to its true significance. It is a guarantee to every State of a government. It is a guarantee against anarchy, a guarantee against violence, a guarantee against one government neutralizing another, a guarantee of the unity of government, for a government to be a government must be a unit. That the government shall be "republican in form" is an incident, an attribute, a quality of the thing guaranteed, which is government, and, as a consequence, order, peace, tranquillity. The primary object of the guarantee is government, and the secondary object security against monarchy, despotism, or aristocracy.

This guarantee, you observe, is made, not by Congress, but by the United States. Its enforcement may under certain circumstances fall to the province of the judicial branch of the Government. It may become the duty of Congress to enforce it, as in the reconstruction of the rebel States, which legislation was indispensable to give the form and machinery of government; but generally it is the province of the President, by taking care that the laws be faithfully executed, to see to it that the States are not subjected to the curse of anarchy. The Executive is the arm of the Government on whom the duty is by various statutes imposed to see that government and order are preserved. To give effect to this guarantee of government, we find that the Constitution in the same paragraph, carrying out the same idea, provides that the United States shall protect each State from invasion. Generally an invasion of any State would be treated only as an infringement of the rights of the Federal Government; but so careful is the Constitution of the peace of the individual States that it provides against one State invading another; and then further provides, that when the governor of a State, when the Legislature cannot be convened, calls for protection against domestic violence, the United States shall respond and protect such State.

Domestic violence is less than anarchy; because it supposes the existence of a governor and a Legislature capable of making the demand for protection. This the President is to do; he is the arm of the United States for that purpose; and in the four acts which have been passed administering and carrying out the provision of the Constitution he is recognized as the branch of the Government that shall render protection against domestic violence. The President is by the Constitution required to protect a State against domestic violence when called upon by the State; and the State of Louisiana did call on President Grant for that protection in the very words of the Constitution.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will be glad to hear the Senator. I was wishing to be very brief.

Mr. CARPENTER. I simply wish to understand the Senator and not to reply to him. I want to know if he claims that under the Constitution itself the President can act at all without legislation on the part of Congress?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do. The President being required by the Constitution, in its language, "to take care that the laws be faithfully executed," and being required to swear that he will faithfully execute his office, if he knows that the laws are being violated and that an insurrection exists, if called upon by the governor or the Legislature of a State, in the language of the Constitution, to protect the State from domestic violence, he is bound, if he has the requisite force, in the absence of any statute, to protect that State. The Constitution administers itself without the aid of Congress. He is as much bound to do so as to perform the injunction to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." There is no statute re-enacting that injunction, I believe. When the Constitution says the United States shall protect against domestic violence, it means the President; if it meant Congress, then Congress must perform the duty, for the powers of government are not capable of being delegated from one branch of government to another, and Congress has never undertaken to perform this duty.

The first act that was passed in reference to this subject was on the 2d of May, 1792, authorizing the President to call out the militia to enforce the laws. There was no question that the President could have used as his posse any force under his control; but there was grave question whether he could call upon the militia; and this act was passed, I think, for the purpose of giving him the power to call on the militia.

The next act was passed in 1794. In 1794 was the whisky insurrection, and an act was then passed authorizing the President to call upon the governors of the States to furnish eighty thousand militiamen, the quotas of the several States being apportioned among them. New Jersey's quota was about four thousand men. The word "insurrection" was at this time introduced into our statutes. And on the 28th of February, 1795, an act was passed authorizing the President to call upon the militia of one State to go into another State for the purpose of suppressing insurrection.

That act having passed, the idea seemed to have grown up that it was questionable whether the President could use any other force than the militia, there being no express act authorizing him to use the Army; and consequently we have in 1807 an act authorizing the President, wherever he could use the militia, to use the Army of the United States.

These acts do not and cannot limit the power of the Constitution to protect against domestic violence. "Domestic violence" is insurrection. I will read the summary of a number of cases which are cited in Paschal. It is in these words:

If there be an armed conflict it is a case of domestic violence; one of the parties must be in insurrection against the lawful government.

If in Louisiana there is domestic violence, two parties contending, one against the other, one party or the other is in insurrection against the government; it is an open, armed, organized violence against the government, and is insurrection; and at all events the term "domestic violence," the constitutional term, includes insurrection.

To insist that the President acted without law when called upon by the governor of Louisiana, in the very language of the Constitution, to protect that State from "domestic violence," because the statute uses the term "insurrection" instead of the term "domestic violence," is, I think, not only technical but illogical.

But we are told that the President should not have enforced Durell's decree. We had better wait, sir, until we have the record, the evidence, and the judgment of Judge Durell, before we put him on trial. We may find him a man of more ability, and perhaps of more character, than some here have given him credit for. He was not without a show of jurisdiction over the case in question. By the act of 31st of May, 1870, the enforcement act, it is provided that where a person is deprived of an election to an office, excepting the offices therein mentioned, by the exclusion of votes on account of race or color, he may bring a suit to recover possession of such office; and the district and circuit courts of the United States have jurisdiction. It was under that act, doubtless, that Judge Durell assumed jurisdiction. I confess I much doubt whether the proper mode of proceeding under this statute was by a bill. The proper mode of proceeding probably was by a quo warranto; but the judge perhaps thought that what he had a right to correct when done he had a right to prevent by injunction from being done.

Mr. CARPENTER. Will my friend allow me to call his attention to one fact?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. CARPENTER. That particular act to which the Senator has referred excepts members of the Legislature from the offices over which the Federal courts have any jurisdiction whatever. Now, the Antoine bill, on which Judge Durell issued his injunction and mandamus, was filed for the express purpose of organizing the Legislature.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The act expressly relates to the office of governor, and these proceedings did involve the enjoyment of that office, and thus Judge Durell obtained jurisdiction.

Then it is said again that the proceeding in his court was a mere ancillary bill to perpetuate testimony, and that it is not competent on such a bill to make a final decree for relief. All that may or may not be true. My point is that it is not the province of the President of the United States to review or to reverse the decrees of the Federal courts. The Senator from Wisconsin and I might debate for some time over the legal propriety of these proceedings, one claiming and the other denying that Durell had jurisdiction; but whether Durell was right or wrong, the province of the President is not to review, but to enforce the decrees of the Federal courts.

Again, it is said that the President should not have recognized the Kellogg government. Well, the President was constrained to recognize one government if he meant to have order; and only one, because the very essence of order is the unity of government. And I do not think he erred much in the selection that he made when the Senator from Wisconsin frankly tells us that he believes that Kellogg had a majority of the lawful votes of that State.

Mr. CARPENTER. The Senator certainly does not wish to misrepresent me. I never said any such thing.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I certainly gathered that from the Senator's remarks.

Mr. CARPENTER. I do not know what the Senator gathered, but I never said any such thing.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Of course if the Senator says that I have misunderstood him, I do not insist upon it. I paid close attention to his speech, and with no intention, I assure him, to misrepresent, gathered that impression from his speech.

Mr. CARPENTER. What I did say, if my friend will allow me a moment, is that I believed, if that election had been fairly conducted, Kellogg would have been elected; but that of the votes actually cast McEnery had thousands majority.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Well, passing that, I do not see that the Senate of the United States can arraign President Grant for recognizing the Kellogg government, because he frankly told us what he would do. He sent us his message, stating in effect that he was under the necessity of recognizing one of the governments of Louisiana, and that he would recognize the Kellogg government if we took no action on the subject. We took no action, and by our silence acquiesced in recognition of the Kellogg government by the President.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend will pardon me, I do not think he states that quite as strongly in favor of the President as he should. I think the President had, before Congress met, been obliged to recognize one government or the other; and upon the evidence then before him it appeared to him to be his duty to recognize the Kellogg government. He reported that circumstance to us, and said unless we chose to change his recognition he should continue, of course, to hold on to it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It certainly does not become us to arraign the President for the recognition.

A few words on another branch of this subject and I have done.

I must dissent from the proposal that the United States shall force upon Louisiana a new election, to be conducted under Federal authority. The Kellogg Legislature is unquestionably de facto the Legislature of Louisiana. The State courts have repeatedly recognized it. There is a necessity that an assemblage which is exercising sovereign power should de facto be recognized, otherwise all the laws enacted would be nullified, and all rights that have vested under that government would be disturbed. The exigencies of municipal government require that the assemblage exercising legislative power should be treated as de facto the Legislature of the State. But no such necessity rests upon us. No exigency for the purposes of municipal government calls on us to recognize that Legislature. I do not think that we are under any constraint to recognize the de facto Legislature or the Senators they have elected. The Legislature that elects a Senator should be such not only de facto, but should be so de jure. An assemblage might usurp, hold, and exercise sovereign power for only six weeks, and elect two Senators to misrepresent that State for six years. Inasmuch as there is no constraint on us, as there is upon the citizens and courts of the State, and even upon the President of the United States, to recognize a de facto Legislature, I think we may claim that Senators be elected by Legislatures which we are satisfied exist de jure. No inconvenience would result from this rule, because, by reason of the frequency with which elections take place in all the States, a State would not be deprived of representation in the Senate for any long period.

Neither can I agree with my friend from Indiana that the recognition of the Kellogg government by the President imposes an obligation on us to recognize that Legislature. I understand it to be our province, and not that of the President, to determine which is the true Legislature. The President recognizes a Legislature de facto for the exigencies of the occasion, in order to maintain peace; but we, and not the President, finally determine which is the true Legislature. That was decided in the case of Luther vs. Borden, in 7 Howard. The court in that case says:

It rests with Congress to decide what government is the established one in a State; for as the United States guarantee to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in a State before it can determine whether it is republican or not.

Therefore, as I do not believe that either the McEnery or the Kellogg Legislature is de jure the Legislature of Louisiana, I would not recognize the Senator elected by either of them; but I would wait until next November, when there is a new house of assembly and one-third of the senate to be elected, and we can then determine whether it be such a Legislature as we can properly recognize.

As to the right of Congress to order a new election, there is certainly grave question. I do not suppose that any one would claim that Congress had the right in every case to sit as does a court when on certiorari it reviews the elections of surveyors of the highways. We are not in every case to determine whether the assemblage assuming to be the law-making power is the true Legislature of a State. This power can only be claimed in a glaring case. Can we ever order a new election?

The Constitution says we are to do two things. First, we are to see that the State has a republican form of government. Louisiana has that. Secondly, we are to see that order is preserved; and this we are to do by protecting the State from invasion and by protecting the State from domestic violence. Having secured these things to the State, we have done our full constitutional duty and all that the public good requires.

What more can the State require? If the government is republican in form, and if the United States exercises such supervision as to enable the people freely to give expression to their sentiments, all the conditions for free government exist. To do more than that is to say that whether the State wills it or not it shall submit to Federal authority. That, I think, is taking away and not guaranteeing republican government. Suppose a treaty existed between Great Britain and this country by which they guaranteed to us a republican form of government. Should Great Britain say, and say truly, that this Congress had been elected by frauds, and that it must disperse, and a new election be held under their supervision? That would, I think, be breaking the guarantee. All that the treaty would require would be that they should preserve our republican form of government and preserve the public peace and order that we might truly have self-government. The frequency with which our elections recur has many evil consequences, but there is one advantage. It is this: if any error or mistake is made by the people it is only a temporary evil; the ensuing election gives the people the right to re-establish their government. Let us preserve order in Louisiana, and suffer the people next November to correct for themselves their past errors.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator give way for the bankrupt bill?

Mr. SARGENT. I desire to ask the Senate to take up the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. STEWART. I only want to make a few remarks, and I shall get through soon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall move to take up the bankrupt bill as soon as the Senator is through.

Mr. SARGENT. I give notice that I shall move to take up the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. STEWART. I do not pretend to understand this question in its details. I have listened quite attentively to the arguments which have been made, and read the report last winter when it was submitted. But there appear to be certain leading admitted facts which raise some very serious considerations.

It is admitted, in the first place, that the returns as they were—the only returns that were made—show that McEnery and his party had between 9,000 and 10,000 majority.

Mr. WEST. No, sir; only 6,600.

Mr. STEWART. The Senator from Louisiana corrects me by saying 6,600. Very well; the number is quite immaterial. If it were but 10 majority, it would raise the same difficult questions that are presented in this record. It is stated by the committee, and sustained by sufficient proof to satisfy their judgment, that if there had been a fair election the result would have been reversed; but that Warmoth and his party so manipulated the election that it was unfair. Two boards of canvassers, or pretended boards of canvassers—it makes no difference, for the purpose of what I have to say, which was legal or whether either was legal—claimed the right to canvass and proclaim the vote. The Warmoth board, who were acting in his interest, it appears, declared one result, after various stages of proceedings and difficulties. The Kellogg board, which I so designate for the sake of convenience, declared a different result, and proclaimed that Kellogg and his party were elected by some 18,000 majority. They arrived at this result by no count, by no canvass, but by an estimate. They said that if they had had a fair election they thought this would have been the result; but I do not find that anybody claims that it was the result. I have heard such kind of talk after elections generally; I have heard it said that if certain things had not occurred a different result would have followed, but I never heard before that the result had occurred. Those different events having transpired, I never heard those results claimed in that form before.

I am inclined to take the statement of the committee, that there were sufficient frauds to vitiate the election, and I am willing to take the statement that if there had been a fair election the Kellogg party would have succeeded by 18,000 majority. I am willing to take the case in just that way; but still it does not get me out of any of my difficulties. That state of the case gets me further in all the time.

It seems that while the two parties were thus struggling to proclaim their candidates and install them in office, the United States district judge issued an injunction against the Warmoth party pretty generally. I listened to the reading of that paper, and a command to the marshal to place the Kellogg government in power and put it in the state-house, Legislature and all. This order was executed by the marshal by the aid of the military, and the Kellogg government was thus established.

The President, with what facts were before him—and I presume he had sufficient facts on which to act in this preliminary way—recognized the Kellogg government. But the case had not been investigated. He recognized it only for the time being, as his subsequent conduct shows most conclusively. He did not pretend that there was anything conclusive in his recognition. He reported the matter to Congress for their investigation and action, and said he would not change his policy unless Congress took some action. It was his duty to keep order. I do not complain of the President at all, and I do not think there is any necessity of investigating this case in order to raise any issue about the conduct of the President. The question is, what ought we to do? The President sent a message to Congress, and Congress failed to act. The committee made a report. The majority reported that there was so much fraud by the Warmoth party in the election, that they did not think the election was valid; and the majority of the committee reported also that they thought a man ought not to be elected by any estimates—that men must have votes and a canvass to be elected under a republican form of government; and they recommended the passage of a bill for a new election, that the people might be heard on the matter. That bill failed. The President has gone on as he said he would, as we knew he would, and kept order in that State as best he could; and I have not a word of fault to find with the President. But that does not dispose of the question before us.

The Legislature that was put into the state-house by the marshal, has elected a man to be United States Senator, and sent him here; and we have got to decide the question of whether he comes from the legitimate government of the State of Louisiana; whether he comes from a Legislature authorized to act; and that is the proposition presented to us. We cannot talk about de facto governments now; we cannot talk about the question of preserving order. We must have a legitimate constitutional Legislature to deal with, if we are going to determine whether this man claiming to be a Senator shall be admitted. We have not got the mere question of keeping order until the matter can finally be determined before us; but we have got the real question before us—whether that was a Legislature.

We are told that the existing government in Louisiana is republican in form. I deny the proposition in toto. I say no government placed in power by mere estimates, although those estimates may be correct, is republican in form. The form of republican government requires that the people shall express themselves in a legal manner by votes. I am not willing that republican government shall rest upon vague estimates. I am not willing in any form to sanction such a proposition as that a party by reason of the use of a Federal judge or by means of the exercise of any other power in a State can set up a Legislature on estimates which nobody can test, and call it a republi can form of government.

I believe this is the exact case intended by that provision of the Constitution that requires the United States to guarantee to each State a republican form of government. It is almost the exact illustration that was used in the debates of the Convention. They said, suppose an oligarchy of conspirators should set up a government without the assent of the people, and call it a republican government on estimates, presuming that it would have been elected if the people had had their voice, and it should assume control; that would be a case for the United States to interfere. Now, here you have a government set up on estimates; and if these men in Louisiana get in power by any means you please, whether by their own force or by Federal force, and are allowed to set up a government on estimates alone, it is very easy for this example to be followed in other States, and in other States the defeated party will be making estimates and assuming control in subversion of all republican government and all republican forms, for the essence of a republican government is the voice of the people expressed in a legal manner through the ballot-box.

When the question comes before us it seems to me that we must pass squarely upon it. What may be necessary to be done, whether to order a new election, or whether to wait until an election shall take place, and refuse to admit the Senator because they have not a republican form of government there within the meaning of the Constitution—what may be best and wisest, is for Congress to determine. I do not profess to express any opinion on that point now; but we cannot admit a Senator from that so-called government, because it is not republican, was not placed in power according to the rules and principles fundamental to republican government.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I move to suspend the present and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 792, on the subject of bankruptcy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FERRY, of Michigan, in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.]

Mr. SARGENT. I proposed asking that the Senate, instead of taking up the bill named by the Senator from Vermont, proceed to the consideration of the regular naval appropriation bill. That bill was received from the House of Representatives some time since, has been considered by the Committee on Appropriations, has been reported back by the committee, and is upon our files printed with the amendments. We have received this bill, and are likely to receive other annual appropriation bills, of which there are a great many, as the Senate remembers, regularly from the House.

There are many advantages in passing upon these bills early in the session. There are a great many disadvantages in allowing them to go over, as has been too much the habit, until the last few days of the session. It is within the experience of Senators, it is within my own, that sometimes appropriation bills have passed at so very late an hour in the session that there has been no time to send the disagreeing votes between the two Houses to a committee of conference, and one or the other House has been compelled to take the amendments of the other House and pass them in a lump, without examination and without consideration. A system of legislation like that, or a system of postponing the regular appropriation bills to produce results like that, is necessarily vicious. The Treasury suffers. There is improper legislation put upon the bills. There is no opportunity for the two Houses to scrutinize the expenditures which are made, and the result is extravagance, the depletion of the Treasury.

Now, the only way in which that can be avoided is not to postpone these appropriation bills week after week for other business, but to take them up as soon as possible after each one of them comes from the House, is examined by our committee and reported back, and pass upon it. Having this in view, and believing that it is a usage of the Senate that these bills should have some species of precedence—if not by actual rule as it is in the other House, at any rate by usage—I have asked and shall ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of this bill.

I do not undervalue the importance of the legislation which the Senator from Vermont proposes, but that bill has been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary for some time, and I believe this is the first effort that has been made to take it up. I certainly have not lost any time in calling the attention of the Senate to the naval apppropriation bill after it was reported back from the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When was it reported?

Mr. SARGENT. On last Friday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The last day of our session.

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir; it was reported, and is before the Senate for action, and I think Senators are prepared to consider the bill. If I am mistaken in this, if I am mistaken in the fact that by the usage of the Senate there is some species of precedence given to appropriation bills, I shall have to withdraw some of the remarks which I have made. On the other hand, if I am correct in that, I desire, as having charge of this bill from my committee, to insist to a reasonable degree that that preference be accorded to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should unite with my friend in insisting that in all reasonable degree appropriation bills should be properly considered; but I submit to him and to the Senate, when this money is not to be spent until after the 1st of July, and when, according to present appearances, we shall not have any money then to spend, he ought to give us more than one day to consider an appropriation bill which involves the expenditure of a great many millions of dollars, before we enter upon its consideration. If, therefore, nothing else were before the Senate but the bill of my friend, and the bankrupt bill were disposed of, I should appeal to him with some considerable hope of success, he being in charge of it, to let the bill lie long enough on our tables that we might ourselves thoroughly understand it, and see if we could not in some way either assist the committee in keeping down the appropriations to the present rate, or help them still further by reducing them in some way conducive to the public good.

Mr. CONKLING. When was it reported?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Only on Friday last. This is the first day, in fact, that the bill could be taken up by the rules of the Senate since it has been reported. It ought not to be urged, where there is no special emergency, with this haste. My friend says, and with great truth, that appropriation bills sometimes get bad things in them for want of scrutiny and examination. They ought to have that scrutiny, and they ought to have the scrutiny of the whole Senate, and not merely of a committee of the Senate.

It is for this very reason that I have not pressed, in season and out of season, the bankrupt bill. It has been reported for a long time; amendments have again been considered and reported, and still others, the Committee on the Judiciary working upon the bill at all seasons, in order to get it, so far as they could, to meet the views of the Senate and to be just to the country. Now, then, after all this time of delay, and delay on purpose that it might have scrutiny and criticism from the country and from Senators, we ask to have it taken up; and my friend from California, with a bill with the ink not yet dry upon it, and which also needs scrutiny, undertakes to say that this bill should be set aside and that one taken up. I submit to him whether that is quite reasonable. I shall stand by him on every proper occasion to give appropriation bills their due precedence after they have lain upon our tables long enough to be fairly understood by Senators themselves.

Mr. MORTON. The Senate has been engaged for some time in the discussion of a financial resolution. I think it important in many respects that a vote should be taken on that resolution and the pending amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan now in the chair, [Mr. FERRY.] The country is awaiting our action upon that resolution; and I hope before we plunge into other business that is likely to take a good many days, we shall make some arrangement about a vote on that resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will not take long to dispose of the bankrupt bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to say that I feel like the Senator from Indiana in regard to the financial resolution. I desire to press it to a vote at as early a day as possible, and I would much prefer if the Senate would now proceed to consider and act upon it. I think the debate is nearly exhausted, although it is a subject necessarily likely to occupy a long time. But at the same time I feel bound to vote for the proposition of the Senator from Vermont. This bankrupt bill was sent to us early in the session. It seems to have received a great deal of consideration. There is a great necessity for its passage in order to meet many cases that have occurred. When the resolution in relation to the finances was first introduced, I offered to give way to the Senator from Vermont, in order to enable him to take up the bankrupt bill; but he was not then prepared to go on with it.

Although I desire a vote on the resolution reported by the Committee on Finance, I do not feel now disposed to antagonize it against a bill the pressing nature of which is conceded by all; but I give notice that after the bankrupt bill is disposed of, I shall insist on having a vote on the financial resolution. The naval appropriation bill ought to be fully considered, but I think a month's delay on these appropriation bills will do no great harm. In the course of a month we can form a better estimate as to the necessities of the next fiscal year. The nature and amount of our receipts, the character of our expenditures, can all be better estimated then; and before I approach any of these appropriation bills, I give notice to the Senator from California and to the Committee on Appropriations that I think they ought to submit to us a full, detailed statement of our probable expenditures for the next fiscal year, and not bring up a single bill or bring up these bills by installments. Let them so master the appropriation bills that they can tell us how much money they will actually need for the next fiscal year, and then I shall be prepared to go into them with careful detail, and I hope we shall be able to reduce them, so that we shall not be compelled to levy more taxes; but at present I do not think we ought to take them up as against either the bankrupt bill or the financial question.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely rise to suggest that we fix upon a day to take the vote on the finance resolutions. If we could agree upon a day on which to take a vote on those resolutions, it would be a notice to all Senators, and they could so arrange matters as to be present. I presume nearly every one desires to vote on those resolutions one way or the other; and I think it would be a very proper thing for us to do now, to agree on a time when we can arrive at a vote. As far as the bankrupt bill is concerned, I feel great interest in it myself; but I am not disposed to press it so as to prevent action on the finance resolutions. I am very desirous that we should act on both, and I think we might agree upon some time for taking the vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will allow me, I should like very much to bring about an agreement as to when the vote shall be taken; but I should like to reserve a day or two for debate, because I know there are several Senators who desire to speak upon the finance question who have not yet had an opportunity to do so.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not desire to prevent them, as far as that is concerned, because I never have interfered with any person in debating a proposition, and do not wish to do so; but, at the same time, if we could agree upon a time when we should take it up again, and then continue it until we get final action, it would not interfere with Senators who may desire to debate it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest that we agree to take it up after the bankrupt bill is disposed of. I do not know how long it will take.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It ought not to take more than two days, in fact not more than one, unless Senators are disposed to make long speeches upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well. Then let it be understood that after the bankrupt bill is disposed of we will go on with the financial resolutions.

Mr. LOGAN. If there is no objection, let that be the understanding of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. So far as I am concerned, I do not quite agree to that. I want to be heard upon that proposition.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I hope the suggestion made by the Senator from Illinois will be acceded to by the Senate. As the chairman of the Committee on Finance has stated, the question of finance has been before the Senate some time and most Senators have expressed themselves upon it. However, there are two or three still who wish to speak on the question. I have in my eye now one Senator who is prepared to address the Senate upon it, and who I think took the floor for that purpose. I share the anxiety expressed by the Senator from Illinois that we should come to a vote upon it. I am also clear in the view that we should set some time when the vote shall be taken on that question, so that Senators may take notice that at that time the vote will be taken. It is a question that involves the interests of the whole country, and certainly I, representing here views on one side and the chairman of the committee on the other, feel that both sides should be thus notified, so that a clear and full vote may be had upon the question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, one or two observations have fallen that lead me to make a single remark. The Senator from Vermont suggests that the money appropriated in the naval bill will not be wanted until the 1st of July next. That is undoubtedly so; but is that a reason for postponing action upon the appropriation bills as they are presented?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; not after a fair time has been given to consider them.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I was going to make a single remark about the idea that Senators are going to study this appropriation bill until it is brought to their attention. The idea that any Senator in this body will ever read an appropriation bill, or know anything about it until it is brought here and he is forced to consider it, my honorable friend knows is a little thin.

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, no; I do not agree with you.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This bill has been in this body from the House of Representatives now quite three weeks. If anybody had a desire to study and learn and ascertain precisely what it contained, he has had an ample opportunity to do so. It comes now from the Committee on Appropriations not very unlike its condition as it came from the House of Representatives, where it was thoroughly discussed. The idea of postponing it so that Senators may read it and be informed in regard to it, and that any Senator here really intends to devote himself to it, even my honorable friend, who, I have no doubt, when the bill comes up, will give it the most assiduous attention—I have seen too much of the mode of considering these bills to believe that that will be done, even if it remains here a month. Nobody will consider it until it is brought to his attention here.

But, Mr. President, the idea of postponing appropriation bills to the end of the session, or near the end of the session, I think is essentially vicious, and the rule, which I understand to have obtained generally in this body by usage if not by courtesy, is that when an appropriation bill is presented it has the right to be heard. I know there are exceptions to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. A good many.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I am sorry there are so many. I am sorry that when a bill of this kind is presented there is not generally a disposition to give it a hearing, and that the argument submitted by my honorable friend that we do not want the money until the next fiscal year obtains so much as it does. It throws these appropriation bills into the last days of the session, when it is utterly impossible to examine them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator misunderstands me. I did not intend to say, and I am sure I did not say, that the fact that the money was not wanted until the 1st of July was a reason for not considering the bill within a reasonable time after it was reported; but it was a reason for not putting it in opposition to this bill, which does affect every man in the country in his business operations every day, and which is needed now. That was the point.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I was about to say that this appropriation bill would probably pass through the Senate in half a day, and then it would leave the committee an opportunity to examine the next bill. This is one of thirteen appropriation bills which are to be examined by the Senate. They cannot, as my honorable friend from Ohio suggests, be postponed for a month, and we then take our chances to put them through. If they are not taken up by the Senate when they come along and given precedence, at the end of the next two months you will have a jam which you cannot break; you will have ten or a dozen or thirteen of these bills, and we shall be thrown into the last of the session to examine these bills, when it will be impossible to give them the consideration they ought to receive.

Now it is proposed to take up the bankrupt bill, which will consume I do not know how many days, and then my honorable friend from Ohio gives notice that he desires to press the financial question for consideration, and by the time that is over something else will be pressed against this appropriation bill. What I desire is that there shall be a sense in the Senate that when an appropriation bill is prepared and offered it shall be entitled to that precedence which, I think, the usage of the Senate has usually given it, and, unless there is a very clear case of necessity in legislation, it ought not to be interfered with. The idea that we are to examine these bills and present them and be responsible for their consideration in the Senate, and yet that they are to be postponed from time to time, or that we are to come into a constant collision to get the floor, it seems to me is not exactly the fair thing to those who have charge of these bills. I hope my honorable friend from Vermont will allow us to go on with this appropriation bill and finish it, and then we can take up his bill, which will take a week, I suppose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I must be excused, and the bill will not take a week, because I want to get into condition to put the United States into bankruptcy after we pass the naval appropriation bill, and it must be done before that time.

But seriously, Mr. President, I do not wish to take any more of your time upon this topic. Here is the motion I make which brings up for decision a bill that affects every commercial interest of the country, that has been waiting a month or two in order to be perfected. It has been perfected. It has lain upon your tables long enough for every Senator, if he chooses, to understand what it proposes to do fully. Now we ask you to dispose of it. In opposition to it is offered a bill—only just reported, only just now entitled for the first time to be taken up—to dispose of money to be paid out six months hence. If the Senate wish to treat the interests of the commercial classes of the country in that way, of course they can do it; it is not within my power to prevent it.

Mr. SARGENT. I wish simply to remark that I shall yield to allow the bankrupt bill to be considered. If the Finance Committee themselves are ready to yield for the bankrupt bill to be considered, I will be as polite as they are; but I shall consider after that that the Committee on Appropriations are entitled to have the naval bill considered. I will waive it now, emulating the courtesy of the Committee on Finance. If they themselves do not value their measure or think it necessary to bring it to a vote, or yield it to this measure, I will be as courteous; but I give notice to the Senate that I shall insist on the early consideration of the naval appropriation bill, and that it shall come up next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the pending and all prior orders be postponed, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bankrupt bill.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 429) creating an additional land district in the Territory of New Mexico, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 798) to establish certain post-routes; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

THE BANKRUPTCY ACT.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 792) to repeal the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and all laws and parts of laws amendatory thereto.

The Committee on the Judiciary reported the bill with an amendment, to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, in the following words:

That the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867; and the act entitled "An act in amendment of an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1867," approved July 27, 1868; and the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1867," approved June 30, 1870; and the act entitled "An act in amendment of the act entitled 'An act establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy in the United States,' approved March 2, 1867," approved July 14, 1870; and the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1867," approved February 13, 1873, and all other laws and parts of laws amendatory of said first-named act, or the amendments thereto, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That all suits and proceedings now pending in the courts of the United States wherein an adjudication for bankruptcy has been made shall be proceeded with and governed by the provisions of existing laws, which are hereby continued in force only for the purpose of closing up suits and proceedings now pending: Provided, That from and after the passage of this act, the fees, commissions, and charges of the officers and agents of the courts in bankruptcy cases shall be reduced to one-half of the fees, commissions, and charges heretofore allowed.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the court may, in its discretion, on sufficient cause shown, and upon notice and hearing, direct the receiver or assignee to take possession of the property, and carry on the business of the debtor, or any part thereof, when, in its judgment, the interest of the estate as well as of the creditors will be promoted thereby, but not for a period exceeding nine months from the time the debtor shall have been declared a bankrupt.

SEC. 2. That unless otherwise ordered by the court, the assignee shall sell the property of the bankrupt, whether real or personal, at public auction, in such parts or parcels and at such times and places as shall be best calculated to produce the greatest amount with the least expense. And the court, on the application of any party in interest, shall have complete supervisory power over such sales, so that the property sold shall realize the largest sum. And the court may, in its discretion, order any real estate of the bankrupt, or any part thereof, to be sold for one-fourth cash in hand at the time of sale, and the residue in three equal installments, bearing interest at the rate 7 per cent. per annum, and payable at intervals of not more than six months between any two payments, and secured by proper mortgage or lien upon the property so sold. And it shall be the duty of every assignee to keep a regular account of all moneys received or expended by him as such assignee, to which account every creditor shall, at reasonable times, have free access. If any assignee shall fail or neglect to well and faithfully discharge his duties in the sale or disposition of property as above contemplated, it shall be the duty of the court to remove such assignee, and he shall forfeit all fees and emoluments to which he might be entitled in connection with such sale. And if any assignee shall, in any manner, in violation of his duty aforesaid, unfairly or wrongfully sell or dispose of, or in any manner fraudulently or corruptly combine, conspire, or agree, with any person or persons, with intent to unfairly or wrongfully sell or dispose of the property committed to his charge, he shall, upon proof thereof, be removed, and forfeit all fees or other compensation for any and all services in connection with such bankrupt's estate, and, upon conviction thereof before any court of competent jurisdiction, shall be liable to a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not exceeding two years, or both fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court. And any person so combining, conspiring, or agreeing with such assignee for the purpose aforesaid, shall, upon conviction, be liable to a like punishment.

And on any settlement of the accounts of any assignee, he shall be required to account for all interest, benefit, or advantage received, or in any manner agreed to be received, directly or indirectly, from the use or deposit of any of the funds coming to his hands as such assignee. And he shall be required, upon such settlement, to make and file in court an affidavit declaring, according to the truth, whether he has or has not, as the case may be, received, or is or is not, as the case may be, to receive, directly or indirectly, any interest, benefit, or advantage from the use or deposit of such funds; and such assignee may be examined orally upon the same subject, and if he shall willfully swear falsely, either in such affidavit or examination, he shall be deemed to be guilty of perjury, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than one and not more than three years.

SEC. 3. That the following words shall be added to section 26 of said act:

That in all causes and trials arising or ordered under this act, the alleged bankrupt, and any party thereto, shall be a competent witness.

SEC. 4. That in cases of compulsory or involuntary bankruptcy, the provisions of said act, and any amendment thereof, or of any supplement thereto, requiring the payment of any proportion of the debts of the bankrupt, or the assent of any portion of his creditors, as a condition of his discharge from his debts, shall not apply; but he may, if otherwise entitled thereto, be discharged by the court in the same manner and with the same effect as if he had paid such per cent. of his debts, or as if the required proportion of his creditors had assented thereto.

And in cases of voluntary bankruptcy, no discharge shall be granted to a debtor whose assets shall not be equal to 33 per cent. of the claims proved against his estate, upon which he shall be liable as principal debtor, without the assent of his creditors, in number and value as prescribed by existing law; and the provision in section 33 of said act of March 2, 1867, requiring 50 per cent. of such assets, is hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. That in cases of involuntary or compulsory bankruptcy, the period of four months mentioned in section 35 of the act to which this is an amendment is hereby changed to two months; but this provision shall not take effect until two months after the passage of this act. And in the cases aforesaid, the period of six months mentioned in said section 35 is hereby changed to three months; but this provision shall not take effect until three months after the passage of this act.

SEC. 6. That section 35 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows:

First. After the word "and," in line 11, insert the word "knowing."

Secondly. After the word "attachment," in the same line, insert the words "sequestration, seizure."

Thirdly. After the word "and," in line 20, insert the word "knowing."

SEC. 7. That section 39 of said act of March 2, 1867, be amended so as to read as follows:

SEC. 39. That any person residing, and owing debts, as aforesaid, who, after the passage of this act, shall depart from the State, District, or Territory of which he is an inhabitant, with intent to defraud his creditors; or, being absent, shall, with such intent, remain absent; or shall conceal himself to avoid the service of legal process in any action for the recovery of a debt or demand provable under this act; or shall conceal or remove any of his property to avoid its being attached, taken, or sequestered on legal process; or shall make any assignment, gift, sale, conveyance, or transfer of his estate, property, rights, or credits, either within the United States or elsewhere, with intent to delay, defraud, or hinder his creditors; or who has been arrested and held in custody under or by virtue of mesne process or execution, issued out of any court of any State, District, or Territory within which such debter resides or has property, founded upon a demand in its nature provable against a bankrupt's estate under this act, and for a sum exceeding $100, and such process is remaining in force and not discharged by payment, or in any other manner provided by the law of such State, District, or Territory, applicable thereto, for a period of twenty days; or has been actually imprisoned for more than twenty days in a civil action founded on contract for the sum of $100 or upward; or who, being bankrupt or insolvent, or in contemplation of bankruptcy or insolvency, shall make any payment, gift, grant, sale, conveyance, or transfer of money or other property, estate, rights, or credits, or confess judgment, or give any warrant to confess judgment, or procure his property to be taken on legal process, with intent to give a preference to one or more of his creditors, or to any person or persons who are or may be liable for him as indorsers, bail, sureties, or otherwise, or with the intent, by such disposition of his property, to defeat or delay the operation of this act; or who, being a banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer, or miner, has fraudulently stopped payment, or who has stopped or suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of forty days, shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy, and, subject to the conditions hereinafter prescribed, shall be adjudged a bankrupt on the petition of one or more of his creditors, who shall constitute one-fourth thereof, at least, in number, and the aggregate of whose debts provable under this act amounts to at least one-third of the debts so provable: Provided, That such petition is brought within six months after such act of bankruptcy shall have been committed. And the provisions of this section shall apply to all cases of compulsory or involuntary bankruptcy commenced since the ——, 1873, as well as to those commenced hereafter. And in all cases commenced since said ——, 1873, and prior to the passage of this act, as well as those commenced hereafter, the court shall, if such allegation as to the number or amount of petitioning creditors be denied by the debtor by a statement in writing to that effect, require him to file in court forthwith a full list of his creditors, with their places of residence and the sums due them, respectively, and shall ascertain, upon reasonable notice to the creditors, whether one-fourth in number and one-third in amount thereof, as aforesaid, have petitioned that the debtor be adjudged a bankrupt.

But if such debtor shall, on the filing of the petition, admit in writing that the requisite number and amount of creditors have petitioned, the court shall so adjudge, which judgment shall be final, and the matter proceed without further steps on that subject. And if it shall appear that such number and amount have not so petitioned, the court shall grant reasonable time, not exceeding, in cases heretofore commenced, twenty days, and, in cases hereafter commenced, ten days, within which other creditors may join in such petition. And if, at the expiration of such time so limited, the number and amount shall comply with the requirements of this section, the matter of bankruptcy may proceed; but if, at the expiration of such limited time, such number and amount shall not answer the requirements of this section, the proceedings shall be dismissed, and, in cases hereafter commenced, with costs. And if such person shall be adjudged a bankrupt, the assignee may recover back the money or property so paid, conveyed, sold, assigned, or transferred contrary to this act: Provided, That the person receiving such payment or conveyance had reasonable cause to believe that the debtor was insolvent, and knew that a fraud on this act was intended; and such person, if a creditor, shall not, in cases of actual fraud on his part, be allowed to prove for more than moiety of his debt; and this limitation on the proof of debts shall apply to cases of voluntary as well as involuntary bankruptcy. And the petition of creditors under this section may be sufficiently verified by the oaths of the first five signers thereof, if so many there be.

And if any of said first five signers shall not reside in the district in which such petition is to be filed, the same may be signed and verified by the oath or oaths of the attorney or attorneys, agent or agents, of such signers. And in computing the number of creditors as aforesaid, who shall join in such petition, creditors whose respective debts do not exceed $250 shall not be reckoned. But if there be no creditors whose debts exceed said sum of $250, or if the requisite number of creditors, holding debts exceeding $250, fail to sign the petition, the creditors having debts of a less amount shall be reckoned for the purposes aforesaid.

SEC. 8. That section 40 of said act be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words: "And if, on the return-day of the order to show cause as aforesaid, the court shall be satisfied that the requirement of section 39 of said act as to the number and amount of petitioning creditors has been complied with, or if, within the time provided for in section 39 of this act, creditors sufficient in number and amount shall sign such petition so as to make a total of one-fourth in number of the creditors and one-third in the amount of the provable debts against the bankrupt, as provided in said section, the court shall so adjudge, which judgment shall be final; otherwise it shall dismiss the proceedings, and, in cases hereafter commenced, with costs."

SEC. 9. That section 41 of said act be amended as follows:

After the word "bankruptcy," in line 8, strike out all of said section, and insert the words:

"And unless, upon such hearing or trial, it shall appear to the satisfaction of said court, or of the jury, as the case may be, that the facts set forth in said petition are true, or if it shall appear that the debtor has paid and satisfied all liens upon his property, in case the existence of such liens was the sole ground of the proceeding, the proceeding shall be dismissed, and the respondent shall recover costs; and all proceedings in bankruptcy may be discontinued on reasonable notice and hearing, with the approval of the court, and upon the assent, in writing, of such debtor, and not less than one-half of his creditors in number and amount; or, in case all the creditors and such debtor assent thereto, such discontinuance shall be ordered and entered; and all parties shall be remitted, in either case, to the same rights and duties existing at the date of the filing of the petition for bankruptcy, except so far as such estate shall have been already administered and disposed of. And the court shall have power to make all needful orders and decrees to carry the foregoing provision into effect."

COMPOSITION WITH CREDITORS.

SEC. 10. That the following provisions be added to section 43 of said act: "That in all cases of bankruptcy now pending, or to be hereafter pending, by or against any person, whether an adjudication in bankruptcy shall have been had or not, the creditors of such alleged bankrupt may, at a meeting called under the direction of the court, and upon not less than ten days' notice to each known creditor of the time, place, and purpose of such meeting, such notice to be personal or otherwise, as the court may direct, resolve that a composition proposed by the debtor shall be accepted in satisfaction of the debts due to them from the debtor. And such resolution shall, to be operative, have been passed by a majority in number and three-fourths in value of the creditors of the debtor assembled at such meeting either in person or by proxy, and shall be confirmed by the signatures thereto of the debtor and —— in number and —— in value of all the creditors of the debtor. And in calculating a majority for the purposes of a composition under this section, creditors whose debts amount to sums not exceeding fifty dollars shall be reckoned in the majority in value, but not in the majority in number; and the value of the debts of secured creditors above the amount of such security, to be determined by the court, shall, as nearly as circumstances admit, be estimated in the same way. And creditors whose debts are fully secured shall not be entitled to vote upon or to sign such resolution without first relinquishing such security for the benefit of the estate.

The debtor, unless prevented by sickness or other cause satisfactory to such meeting, shall be present at the same, and shall answer any inquiries made of him; and he, or, if he is so prevented from being at such meeting, some one in his behalf, shall produce to the meeting a statement showing the whole of his assets and debts, and the names and addresses of the creditors to whom such debts respectively are due.

Such resolution, together with the statement of the debtor as to his assets and debts, shall be presented to the court; and the court shall, upon notice to all the creditors of the debtor of not less than five days, and upon hearing, inquire whether such resolution has been passed in the manner directed by this section; and if satisfied that it has been so passed, it shall, subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, and upon being satisfied that the same is for the best interest of all concerned, cause such resolution to be recorded and statement of assets and debts to be filed; and until such record and filing shall have taken place, such resolution shall be of no validity. And any creditor of the debtor may inspect such record and statement at all reasonable times.

The creditors may, by resolution passed in the manner and under the circumstances aforesaid, add to, or vary the provisions of, any composition previously accepted by them, without prejudice to any persons taking interests under such provisions who do not assent to such addition or variation. Any such additional resolution shall be presented to the court in the same manner and proceeded with in the same way and with the same consequences as the resolution by which the composition was accepted in the first instance. The provisions of a composition accepted by such resolution in pursuance of this section shall be binding on all the creditors whose names and addresses and the amounts of the debts due to whom are shown in the statement of the debtor produced at the meeting at which the resolution shall have been passed, but shall not affect or prejudice the rights of any other creditors.

Where a debt arises on a bill of exchange or promissory note, if the debtor shall be ignorant of the holder of any such bill of exchange or promissory note, he shall be required to state the amount of such bill or note, the date on which it falls due, the name of the acceptor and of the person to whom it is payable, and any other particulars within his knowledge respecting the same; and the insertion of such particulars shall be deemed a sufficient description by the debtor in respect to such debt.

Any mistake made inadvertently by a debtor in the statement of his debts may be corrected upon reasonable notice, and with the consent of a general meeting of his creditors.

Every such composition shall, subject to priorities declared in said act, provide for a pro rata payment or satisfaction, in money, to the creditors of such debtor, in proportion to the amount of their unsecured debts, or their debts in respect to which any such security shall have been duly surrendered and given up.

The provisions of any composition made in pursuance of this section may be enforced by the court, on motion made in a summary manner by any person interested, and on reasonable notice; and any disobedience of the order of the court made on such motion shall be deemed to be a contempt of court. Rules and regulations of court may be made in relation to proceedings of composition herein provided for in the same manner and to the same extent as now provided by law in relation to proceedings in bankruptcy.

If it shall at any time appear to the court on notice, satisfactory evidence, and hearing, that a composition under this section cannot, in consequence of legal difficulties, or for any sufficient cause, proceed without injustice or undue delay to the creditors or to the debtor, the court may refuse to accept and confirm such composition, or may set the same aside; and, in either case, the debtor shall be proceeded with as a bankrupt in conformity with the provisions of law, and proceedings may be had accordingly; and the time during which such composition shall have been in force shall not, in such case, be computed in calculating periods of time prescribed by said act.

SEC. 11. That from and after the passage of this act the fees, commissions, charges, and allowances, excepting actual and necessary disbursements, of, and to be made by, the officers, agents, marshals, messengers, assignees, and registers in cases of bankruptcy, shall be reduced to one-half of the fees, commissions, charges, and allowances heretofore provided for or made in like cases: Provided, That this section shall be and remain in force until the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States shall make and promulgate new rules and regulations in respect to the matters aforesaid, under the powers conferred upon them by sections 10 and 47 of said act, and no longer. And said justices shall have power under said sections, by general regulations, to simplify and consolidate the duties, so far as in their judgment will conduce to the benefit of creditors, of the register, assignee, marshal, and clerk, to the end that prolixity, delay, and unnecessary expense may be avoided.

And no register or clerk of court, or any partner or clerk of such register or clerk of court, or any person having any interest with either in any fees or emoluments in bankruptcy, or with whom such register or clerk of court shall have any interest in respect to any matter in bankruptcy, shall be of counsel, solicitor, or attorney, either in or out of court, in any suit or matter pending in bankruptcy in either the circuit or district court of his district, or in an appeal therefrom. Nor shall they, or either of them, be executor, administrator, guardian, commissioner, appraiser, divider, or assignee of or upon any estate within the jurisdiction of either of said courts of bankruptcy; nor be interested, directly or indirectly, in the fees or emoluments arising from either of said trusts. And the last clause but one in section 4 of said act is hereby repealed.

SEC. 12. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator will suspend, the Chair will clear his table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was merely going to say that I rise to move that the Senate adjourn, but I will defer the motion till the Chair has cleared his table.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 429) creating an additional land district in the Territory of New Mexico was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. No. 1400) for the relief of William H. Vesey was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 1401) granting a pension to Penelope T. Heald was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 45) tendering the thanks of Congress to Captain Benjamin Gleadell, officers, and crew, of the steamship Atlantic, of the White Star line, for saving the brigantine Scotland in mid-ocean, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STOCKTON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 1013) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HOWARD COURT OF INQUIRY.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 43) authorizing a special court of inquiry concerning General O. O. Howard was read twice by its title.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senate will agree to take up that resolution now it will save the trouble of a reference.

Several SENATORS. Let it be referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the consideration of this joint resolution. The joint resolution will be read at length.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That the President of the United States be requested and authorized to convene a court of inquiry, to consist of not less than five officers of the Army, whose duty it shall be, when so convened, to fully investigate all the charges against Brigadier-General O. O. Howard, contained in the communication of the Secretary of War to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of date December 5, 1873, and to report their opinion as well upon moral as upon technical and legal responsibility for such offenses, if any, as may be discovered: Provided, That the accused may be allowed the same right of challenge as is allowed by law in trials by court-martial.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the joint resolution? The Chair hears no objection; and the joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LOGAN. I have two amendments to offer. I was notified today by the Secretary of War of a mistake that occurs in the resolution in the date. In referring to the communication made by the Secretary of War, the resolution recites that it was on the 5th day of December, 1873. The communication was dated the 4th December, 1873. I move to amend by striking out "5th" and inserting "4th." I move also to insert, immediately following, "and the 5th day of January, 1874;" so as to embrace the two communications.

Mr. SHERMAN. What communications are those?

Mr. LOGAN. Communications sending the charges to the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHERMAN. What was the second communication, of January 5th?

Mr. LOGAN. It was of similar character. That date does not appear in the House resolution.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WEST. I do not know whether I shall be prepared to vote for this resolution or not. It will depend somewhat on the replies that may be made by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs to what I shall ask him.

When this matter was called to the attention of the Senate the other day, it occurred to me that here was a departure from the ordinary rule governing the organization of military courts of inquiry. On examination of that view, I ascertain that such is the fact; that under the law as it now exists the President of the United States is authorized to convene a court of inquiry in this precise case; and the present joint resolution extends his power only so far as to make an increased number of that court from three to five. Consequently the Senate has presented to it the occasion for this legislation. For some reason or other it would seem—and there I ask the chairman of the committee what is that reason—that there was a necessity or desirability for increasing the number of the court in this case from three to five members. I submit that if that proposition for an increase is intended to benefit the party in question, it should not be made. If the proposition for that increase is intended to persecute him, again it should not be made. If the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs can satisfy me and at the same time satisfy the Senate that it is to further the ends of justice, that in the present case a special court of inquiry should be created of five members, then perhaps we shall be ready to vote for it; but until he does, until it can be demonstrated that a court of five is any better than a court of three—that it is necessary in this particular instance to depart from the usage of the Army for all time, or ever since 1795 I believe, I shall withhold my vote on the question.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator calls on me to explain what the benefits of this may be, or whether it is a persecution or otherwise. I can only say that I know nothing in the world about the reasons why the number should be increased. The joint resolution came from the House, and my attention was called to it by the Senator from Maine. I have never had any communication with General Howard on the subject, or from the Secretary of War, save the one that I have mentioned in reference to the dates. The reasons for this increase have not been made apparent to me, except so far as they are obvious on the face of the proceeding.

The law in reference to courts of inquiry provides that courts of inquiry shall be ordered by the President of the United States, and shall consist of one or more members, not exceeding three. I presume the reason for the number fixed in this resolution is that a court constituted of one or two or three members would not be so satisfactory to General Howard or to other parties perhaps as a court of this number. I suppose that is the reason. I understand that General Howard asks for this court; I have been so informed, but I do not know the fact; and I understand also that it is proposed with the consent of the War Office, and yet I do not know that fact. I only know that if there is an investigation to be made, it is a proper thing to allow it to be made in this way, and it is not improper that it should be made by five officers instead of one, two, or three. That is all there is in it, so far as I know anything about it.

If it is proper to make a court of three officers it is just as proper to make it of five, and with the number of five there would probably be more likelihood, with the power of challenging, of having a fair investigation. That is the only reason for it. I know none other. I am willing, if the general desires an investigation, that he should have it, and that is the reason I am in favor of the resolution. I see no objection to it. It does not change the offense or the punishment, if any should be necessary. If there is any guilt, it cannot affect that. It is only increasing the number of the court. It does not change the manner of trial, the manner of investigation, or anything of that character. It allows him to challenge any person he may desire to do, the same as in a court-martial.

Mr. WEST. He has that right now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I hardly think there is anything so unusual in this proposition as to raise a suspicion either one way or the other of favoritism toward the general, or the converse. Undoubtedly, the President has the right to convene a court of inquiry, but the President did not see fit to do that thing. The President did not exercise that authority in the premises; but, on the contrary, the Secretary of War referred the whole question to Congress. The House of Representatives propose, therefore, to convene a court of inquiry of a larger number of persons simply than the President of the United States would be authorized to do if he had undertaken to exercise that authority. Now, I hardly think, if my honorable friend from Louisiana will allow me to say so, that the fact that the House of Representatives, to whom this subject was referred, have fixed the number at five instead of three, should raise an implication one way or the other; and I think it can fairly be inferred that they might have supposed that the number of five on a subject of this kind, which has attracted so much attention in the country, might be more satisfactory, leaving it to the President of course to detail the court. I therefore dismiss that matter with no further remark than that I hardly think any reference unfavorable to General Howard, or favorable to him, could arise; because it is, after all, in the power of the President, as it was before, to appoint the members of the court; and this does not change it at all except to add to the number.

There is power of challenge here, and so it is under the law as it stands. Therefore it will be seen that the action of the House has changed no right whatever. There is nothing in it in the world except the addition of two members to the court. I hope the Senate will think that is no objection, and that this resolution will be concurred in, and this officer, distinguished in the war, harassed a good deal by the investigations that have already been made in another quarter, may have this tribunal instituted in such a way as that it shall satisfy the public that a fair investigation has been had both for him and for the country.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to ask my friend whether he understands that this is desired by General Howard.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I understand that General Howard is perfectly willing that such an inquiry should be made.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I would ask my friend whether upon the whole it is not advisable that we should have the light of a committee on this measure that shall consider it and report whether this resolution is in proper form. It is evidently an innovation. That seems clear. Here is to be a court of five where usually is a court of three.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; that does not follow. It is a court of one or three, as the President may determine.

Mr. SUMNER. One or three; now five; but why five? I do not mean to object to that; but I wish to know the reason, and I should like to have the report of a committee that would explain to the Senate the precise condition of this case. We are now acting in the dark.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator is aware, I suppose, that this resolution comes from the House of Representatives.

Mr. SUMNER. So I understand; but the House sometimes acts prematurely.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will give a reason that occurs to me why they might have fixed five, instead of leaving it to the President to fix the number, because, leaving it with the President, he may fix one. Now, I submit to my friend from Massachusetts that he would hardly desire that the matter should be left to the President so that this whole inquiry might go to one officer, and where the court might be constituted of one, two, or three. I cannot imagine any reason except that the House, on the whole, felt that it was a matter of sufficient importance to fix this number.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the resolution. Indeed I think, after the official statement of the Secretary of War, something like this ought to be passed. But I call the attention of the chairman of the Military Committee to the singular phraseology of this resolution; and it strikes me as rather ungrammatical at least; and it is so confused that it is utterly impossible for anybody to understand precisely what it means. I will read it. After reciting the communications made by the Secretary of War it provides for a court of five to examine, &c., "and to report their opinion as well upon moral as upon technical and legal responsibility for such offenses"—to report "their opinion for such offenses" is the reading of it. It seems to me some such language as this, "and to report their opinion upon his legal responsibility for the offenses charged in said communications, upon moral as well as upon technical grounds," would be better.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator read the preceding words?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will read the whole of it, and the Senator will see that there is no grammatical connection:

That the President of the United States be requested and authorized to convene a court of inquiry, to consist of not less than five officers of the Army, whose duty it shall be, when so convened, to fully investigate all the charges against Brigadier-General O. O. Howard, contained in the communication of the Secretary of War to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, of date December 4, 1873, and January 5, 1874—

That is complete in itself—and to report their opinion as well upon the moral as upon the technical and legal responsibility for such offenses, if any, as may be discovered.

Not "his offenses;" nor is there a grammatical connection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think that is a little sharp.

Mr. SUMNER. Does not that suggestion make it advisable that it should be referred to a committee?

Mr. CONKLING. When I heard the Senator from Ohio make his statement I ventured to shake my head, and, having done that, I will venture further to state my reason for shaking it. If there is criticism here at all, which I think would be rather hypercritical, I submit it would be that the word "offenses" has been used in the place of the word "charges," or some other word. Let me read, and see if there is any doubt what it means:

To fully investigate the charges against Brigadier-General O. O. Howard—

These are the charges to be investigated, and he is the man against whom they exist—contained in the communications of the Secretary of War to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of date, &c., and to report their opinion as well upon the moral as upon the technical and legal responsibility for such offenses, if any.

How there can be any possible doubt that it refers to the offenses which shall be found, if any, in investigating these charges, and how there can be any doubt that the charges to be investigated are charges against General O. O. Howard, and the charges contained in these communications from the Secretary of War, does not occur to me. It is very likely that it might have been written in a more graceful and flowing way, but when you come to the legal effect of it, it seems to me there can be no doubt in regard to it.

Mr. President, as I have occupied the attention of the Senate for a single moment, I will say one other word. It is the privilege, if it be a privilege, of the military profession alone that the honor and integrity of that profession is committed to its own members. In our organism, I believe there is no other instance in which men of a given profession are to be tried by judges and jurors necessarily of that profession. Whether this be wise or otherwise it gives rise to a peculiarity, to say the least, in the administration of justice. In addition to the general singularity of such a case, in this instance there is another. The Secretary of War, who is merely a member of the official staff of the President, insomuch that the Supreme Court has held that the act of a cabinet minister is the act of the President himself—the Secretary of War has sent to Congress a communication which contains the charges upon which this officer is to be tried or of which inquiry is to be made. Therefore should Congress commit to the President alone the discretion of selecting one officer if he chooses to make this inquiry, in addition to committing to him a discretion disagreeable under the circumstances, it would be to commit to him a discretion which, if exercised by the selection of one officer, or even of two officers, or three officers, would leave General Howard and other persons cause perhaps to complain or to suspect in a certain event the impartiality at least with which the selection had been made. Therefore it seems to me very natural that the House had said, "Inasmuch as this is an officer to be committed to the charge of his brother officers in respect of alleged offenses to which attention has been called by the executive department, it is well that five men at least shall take part in this inquiry, because the concurrence of five minds, especially under such circumstances, will be more satisfactory and convincing than would be the judgment of one man, and by parity of reasoning more satisfactory and convincing than would be the judgment even of three men." Looking, then, to the inherent delicacy of the subject, and looking to the special fact that these charges have emanated with the executive department, to which department must be committed the selection of the court to inquire into his conduct, it seems to me very obvious, very natural, very reasonable, very politic, very just, that the court should be comprised of five rather than of one man or even of three men.

Now, learning, as I do, that General Howard has no objection to this inquiry, which I think is to his credit, I cannot suppose that this proceeding will fail to address itself to the sensibility of every member of the Senate. Here is an officer, certainly distinguished in service, distinguished in the sufferings which his service inflicted upon him, a man maimed in body, and who until this inquiry shall be made must be regarded as maimed in reputation. If he is willing or desirous that his conduct shall be inquired into, and by a court so rigorous as must be a court to whom apply especial obligations and considerations of honor, in that respect, it seems to me, there should be no doubt. Then when you come to the particular resolution, as my friend from Maine has said, it is the ordinary resolution, and only that, except that two additional members of the court are provided for, and I cannot doubt that to General Howard and to his friends and to the whole public the judgment of this court, being composed of five, will have more weight than it would have if it were composed of one or even of three; and, therefore, in that respect I am quite content to vote for the resolution.

Mr. MORTON. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to one very marked peculiarity about this resolution, and that is that this commission is to inquire, as well upon moral as upon technical and legal responsibility, "for such offenses, if any, as may be discovered." It is a question in my mind whether it is important for an act of Congress to provide for an inquiry of that character. An investigation which may go to the legal responsibility of men, whether they have violated their duties in such a way as to make them responsible and violated the law, may be proper; but when you pass that and get into the moral question, that, it occurs to me, is more proper for the church or the society to which a man belongs.

Mr. CONKLING. Allow me to make a suggestion to the Senator.

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator read the communication of the Secretary of War, or saw it noticed, it doubtless struck him that some of the allegations related to the acts of persons other than General Howard, connected with him—subordinate to him; those for whose acts, at least in a legal sense, he might be responsible. Of course it is of the very essence, not only of the feeling but of the right of General Howard, to have the public know whether he is to blame—to blame in that sense—not which would charge his sureties, if he had given an official bond, but in that sense also which touches his integrity, which blights his name or tarnishes his character as a man; and to the end that this court of inquiry may solve that question—and I observe that it is not a court-martial, but a court of inquiry, to investigate and ascertain—this court is authorized to pronounce not only upon the cold formalities of this case, upon the question of legal liability, but also upon the question of the integrity, the honor, and the intention of the man in question.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, in regard to the suggestion made by the Senator from Indiana I have to observe, that there never has been a time in the history of this Government, when we had a regular Army, that conduct unbecoming a gentleman and a soldier was not good cause not merely for a court of inquiry, but for a court-martial and dismissal from the service; and I suppose that immoral conduct is unbecoming a gentleman and a soldier. In fact, we have had one very striking instance of it, and that without any court-martial at all, but under authority which was then conferred upon the President. General Jackson, then President of the United States, struck from the roll of the Navy a lieutenant because he did not pay his board bill to a widow with whom he boarded in this city; and it was a very good example and had a very salutary effect.

Mr. President, I shall vote for this resolution, whether the court is to consist of three or five, or of whatsoever number it shall consist; but I cannot refrain from the expression of some surprise that this subject has come before Congress in this form at all. General Howard is an officer of the Army of the United States, subject to the Rules and Articles of War, subject to trial by court-martial, and therefore subject to be investigated by a court of inquiry. The President of the United States has had all the time the amplest authority to organize a court of inquiry to investigate his conduct, or to order his trial before a court-martial; and why Congress should be applied to to spur up the President to organize a court of inquiry in this particular case is a little past my comprehension.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. THURMAN. Let me get through.

Mr. CONKLING. I simply want to state a fact to the Senator.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask him whether he understands that the statute of limitations has run in this case, so that, without some enabling act, the action cannot be taken?

Mr. THURMAN. If the statute of limitations has run against the offense, then I do not think we are making a retroactive law to destroy the effect of that statute. If the power of the President to order a court of inquiry by reason of the lapse of time has expired, but the prosecution of the offenses themselves is not barred, there is good reason for coming to Congress; but I do not understand that to be the fact. If it be so, let it go for what it is worth. But this is the record: the two letters of the Secretary of War to the House of Representatives, accompanied by numerous documents as exhibits, among others, a very lengthy report from the Adjutant-General of the United States. Now, sir, if there is the least foundation in the world for these accusations against General Howard, these accusations that are considered so solemn that they are made the subject of communication to the Congress of the United States, I must express my astonishment that the Executive has not ordered a court of inquiry long ago to investigate these matters. Why, sir, let me give the Senate a brief idea of one of the accusations here. I read from the letter of the Secretary of War to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, of the date of 4th of December last, in which he says:

The responsibility and accountability attaching to the late Commissioner, so far as now developed, amounts to upward of $278,573.66—

More than a quarter of a million of dollars—and may be stated under the following headings:

1. Claimed by colored claimants, who allege that they have not been paid their pay and bounty, although the records of the Treasury Department show settlement of the claims, and vouchers have been filed by the late Bureau as evidence of payment, $33,888.39.

And I may remark on that item that it is stated further on that those claims of colored soldiers for pay and bounty are to a great extent, if not in their entirety, a valid claim, and that the vouchers filed purporting to be their receipts for their pay and bounty are shown to be forgeries. But that is not all:

2. Defalcation of St. Clair Mandeville, $8,503.29.
3. Defalcation of O. C. French, reduced to $3,814.54.
4. Defalcation of B. P. Runkle, $673.24.
5. Acknowledged, by George W. Balloch, to have been paid to B. P. Runkle "to reimburse the latter for mistakes made by his agents in paying bounties to the wrong parties," $1,331.03.
6. Due by the late Bureau—

He speaks of the "late Bureau," because the affairs of that Bureau were turned over, it will be remembered, about a year or so ago, to the War Department; therefore it is a "late Bureau;" it is the Bureau of which General Howard was the head—

6. Due by the late Bureau in consequence of illegal double payments and certain accrued interest, several thousand dollars.
7. Irregular fund, (called retained bounty fund,) under the act of March 2, 1867, (Statutes, 14, page 145,) not accounted for, upward of $121,000.
8. Misapplication of public funds, and filing vouchers with the accounts covering a certain month, when payments were made in a prior month:

Misapplication	$36,314 77
Vouchers covering time subsequent to the actual date of payment and therefore erroneous	73,048 40
Total	109,363 17

That is not all. If we return to the remarks on the report made by the Adjutant-General of the Army to the Secretary of War, dated August 4, 1873, we find this statement:

1. The statement that, up to the date of the report, one hundred and seventy-four colored soldiers claim sums due them for pay and bounty, amounting to $33,888.39 in the aggregate, vouchers for the payment of which have already been filed in the Treasury Department, is sustained by satisfactory evidence. Although payments in some of the cases may have been erroneously made, there are good reasons for believing that many of the vouchers filed are fraudulent. Some have already been proved to be so by a judicial investigation, the whole are tainted, and the Treasury Department will doubtless suspend all of them. Unless those concerned in these transactions can satisfactorily demonstrate their innocence of intent to defraud the United States Government and the claimants, they should be proceeded against for violation of the provisions of section 16 of the act of August 6, 1846, and of section 1 of the act of March 2, 1863.

Again, here is another most singular thing:

Although the act of March 3, 1865, which established the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, required the Commissioner provided for therein to give a bond in the sum of $50,000, conditioned for the faithful discharge of his duties, one was not given by General Howard, the appointee.

But, again, by his own authority, as it is here found stated to be, in violation of law, General Howard appointed George W. Balloch, as follows:

On 20th June, 1865, General Howard, Commissioner, &c., in Special Orders No. 14, required George W. Balloch aforesaid, a volunteer commissary of subsistence retained in the Freedmen's Bureau, in addition to his duties in the Subsistence Department, to "temporarily perform the duties of chief disbursing officer of this Bureau."

And George W. Balloch and his affairs came to grief; and now on that subject this report says:

Prior to the 12th of October, 1871, when General Howard relieved Balloch of the duty, this large fund—

The fund which he has mentioned, and which had been appropriated partly by Congress and partly realized by proceeds of abandoned lands and other abandoned property—was held and disbursed by Balloch, who rendered accounts therefor to the Treasury. My greatest surprise in connection with this subject is that the Treasury officers should have accepted the accounts from Balloch, who was not known to the law at all. As well might a paymaster's clerk presume to render accounts for disbursements by a paymaster of the Army. While I do not doubt that Balloch may be held to account for any misconduct in connection with this matter, I am quite certain General Howard can and should be held as responsible by the United States for any portion of this fund not properly accounted for by Agent Balloch as for that disbursed by himself after he relieved Balloch.

These are only specimens of the charges against General Howard. I express no opinion upon them; I know nothing about the facts; and I am one of the last men to make charges in support of which I have no evidence. But I do say that if they are what prima facie they appear to be by this report of the Secretary of War and the report of the Adjutant-General, then I am lost in astonishment to know why it is that this man has not been investigated by a court of inquiry, or tried by a court-martial, long before this.

The only thing that occurs to my mind as a possible excuse for coming to Congress with this subject at all is to be found in a very singular doubt of the Attorney-General, for these matters were referred to him for legal opinion, and in that opinion he uses this language:

A more difficult question arises under section 3 of the joint resolution of March 29, 1867, whereby "all money held or disbursed under the provisions of this resolution shall be held and disbursed under the same rules and regulations governing other disbursing officers of the Army."

That is, all money held or disbursed by General Howard or his subordinates by the express provisions of this law were to be held and disbursed under the same rules and regulations governing other disbursing officers of the Army.

Then the Attorney-General proceeds:

The language of this is a little obscure, when reference is made to the act establishing the Freedmen's Bureau, and this obscurity probably arises from the fact, of which I am informed, that all the principal officers of the Bureau were military officers assigned to this special duty. I do not think that this provision can be considered as subjecting to trial by court-martial a person not otherwise subject to such jurisdiction. To have that effect an act ought to be clear and unambiguous, and it would only be by a most forced and violent construction that "rules and regulations governing other disbursing officers of the Army" can be interpreted to include liability to trial by martial law in respect of civilians.

That is, Mr. Attorney-General all at once has become extremely anxious for the liberty of the citizen, and doubts exceedingly whether a major-general of the Army of the United States, charged with holding and disbursing vast sums of money under the rules and regulations of the Army, as expressly declared by statute, can be tried by a military court-martial! Well, sir, there was a time when people were tried by military commissions and military courts-martial who were not in the Army of the United States, and in States where the civil courts were in the full and undisturbed exercise of their functions. There was some doubt, to say the least, about the regularity of this. There was no doubt at all in the mind of the judges of the Supreme Court when the question came before them. But that there should be a doubt whether a major-general of the Army of the United States, holding and disbursing millions of money under the rules and regulations of the Army, expressly so declared by statute, was liable to be investigated by a court of inquiry or tried by a court-martial, is a thing, I must say, that passes my legal comprehension.

But, sir, I suppose it was that doubt which brought this case before Congress, and I do not therefore blame the President or the Secretary of War for sending it to Congress. If the law officer of the Government will give such opinions as that I do not blame the President, who is no lawyer, or his Secretary of War, who is no lawyer, for sending the matter to Congress.

Mr. President, I shall vote for this resolution. It is time this investigation was made, and it is proper that it should be made, in my judgment, by a court of inquiry.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not see what the opinion of the Attorney-General has to do with this resolution. However, I think there may well have been a doubt in the mind of the Attorney-General as to whether General Howard was subject to a court-martial in this case or not. The fact that many persons may have been tried by military commissions during the war has nothing to do with the point in this case. A question arose as to whether General Howard, in his military capacity, was liable before a court-martial for the conduct of a subordinate officer who did not belong to the Army. There is the statement of the case. I have my doubts on that subject. I do not claim to be so brilliant a jurist as my friend from Ohio, but if I were the judge-advocate of a court-martial to-day, I would hold the same opinion that the Attorney-General did in reference to the responsibility of an officer for a subordinate officer before a court-martial, and that was the question arising why he was not subjected to a court-martial at that time.

Another question arises here. It is intimated, and truly, that if a court of inquiry should be organized now, still General Howard would not be subject to a court-martial. Why? Because the statute of limitations having run, although an inquiry may be made, yet he could not be placed before a court-martial. But that fact cuts no figure in this case. Although the time may have expired when a court-martial might take jurisdiction of an offense perpetrated by a military officer, yet Congress has the power to act if a military court cannot. Hence this court of inquiry is for the purpose of ascertaining the facts in reference to the charges that are made against General Howard, and then action can be taken, if not by a court-martial, by the Congress of the United States. There is a jurisdiction somewhere that will take cognizance of the case if the evidence is sufficient to show that General Howard is criminally guilty.

A criticism has been made in reference to the use of the word "moral" in the latter part of this resolution, and I will answer that now. The reason is because an officer of the Army is held as strictly to moral conduct as he is to legal conduct. Any dishonorable practices, whether they would make him criminally liable or not, would cashier an officer before a court-martial. Hence the words are used, "not only legally guilty, but morally guilty;" so that if there is a great moral guilt, he is as much liable, so far as the rules of the Army are concerned, as if he were legally and technically guilty. These are the reasons, I presume, why the resolution was worded in the manner in which it is.

When the resolution was called up here I said that I knew nothing about it, and it was true. I only understood that General Howard desired an investigation, and that the Secretary of War desired an investigation, and I was willing that they should have it. For that reason I did not take any pains to ascertain the reasons about it; nor do I know them now. But when the Senator asks why has this matter been brought here, I will say that it was referred to the House of Representatives, and the Committee on Military Affairs in the House of Representatives, as I have been informed since this discussion commenced, spent some three weeks investigating the case, and this resolution is the result of their investigations. This resolution came from the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, asking that a court of inquiry be authorized, to consist of five officers, so that no objection should be made, so that neither General Howard nor the Secretary of War should say that one man was selected to investigate who would not do it fairly, and that General Howard should have the right of challenge, so that no one could say it was not a fair court of inquiry to investigate these charges. These are the reasons, as I am informed by one of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House since this question has been before the Senate. I have received more information about it since the discussion than I knew before, except the fact that I have read the charges that were made by the Secretary of War. Those I did not desire to go into, as the Senator from Ohio has. I did not desire to read them, because I do not think they cut any figure in the case whatever. However much we might think General Howard guilty or innocent, this is a mere question whether an inquiry should be made to ascertain the facts. For that reason I did not refer to the charges, but left them entirely out of the case, so that the Senate should merely give the authority to the President or to the Secretary of War to order this court, that the inquiry might be made by them entirely unbiased, without any of the evidence or facts except such as they might have laid before them after they are organized.

A court of inquiry is nothing more than an examination preliminary to a court-martial. It is like an examination of a grand jury into a question that may be presented to a court. It is a mere examination to ascertain the facts in the premises, that those facts may be laid before a court-martial, that they may try the person accused who is at the time belonging to the Army of the United States. If the charges are sustained, and are such as a court-martial would convict for, then, if the time has expired when a court-martial could act, there is a tribunal that can act; and that is the reason for this resolution, I presume, without having any more knowledge of the facts than I now have.

I have read this resolution carefully, and I do not think it is subject to the criticism made by the Senator from Ohio. It might probably be made to read a little better, but it certainly is plain and comprehensive, and refers to General Howard as having been charged with certain offenses, and directs a court of inquiry to inquire in respect to the charges made by the Secretary of War on the 4th of December, 1873, and the 5th of January, 1874.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator, as it is a short resolution, have the kindness to read it, or send it to the desk to be read?

Mr. LOGAN. I will read it:

That the President of the United States be requested and authorized to convene a court of inquiry, to consist of not less than five officers of the Army, whose duty it shall be, when so convened, to fully investigate all the charges against Brigadier-General O. O. Howard, contained in the communications of the Secretary of War to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of date December 4, 1873, and January 5, 1874, and to report their opinion as well upon the moral as upon the technical and legal responsibility for such offenses, if any, as may be discovered: Provided, That the accused may be allowed the same right of challenge as is allowed by law in trials by court-martial.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not see that that is obscure.

Mr. LOGAN. I was just saying, in answer to the criticism of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] that I do not see it in the light he does. I do not think the resolution is obscure. I think it is perfectly easy to understand, and its reference to General Howard is sufficient to know what the court are to inquire into, in regard to the charges of the Secretary of War. I do not see any necessity for any amendment in that particular, and therefore I am in favor of the passage of the resolution, merely to give the opportunity, as I have stated, for this investigation, without expressing any opinion whatever on the facts. I know nothing about them, as to his guilt or innocence. I hope, however, because of my knowledge of the man and service with him in the field, that he will have this court, and that he may show that he is not guilty of these charges. Still, I say I have no opinion whatever on the case, but I hope the opportunity may be afforded to the Secretary of War to present the charges, and to General Howard to refute them, if they can be refuted.

Mr. HOWE. I was a little startled to hear the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] hold up the Attorney-General here as having expressed the opinion that a brigadier-general or a major-general of the Army could not be tried by court-martial.

Mr. THURMAN. I did not state that.

Mr. HOWE. I understood the Senator to read an extract from a letter written by the Attorney-General to the Secretary of War, and to argue from that that the Attorney-General was of the opinion that a major-general of the Army could not be tried by court-martial, and to contrast that statement with what he referred to as the former practice under the Government.

Mr. THURMAN. What I said was that he had a doubt whether a major-general—I ought to say perhaps a brigadier-general—of the Army could be tried by a court-martial for misconduct in relation to the holding and disbursement of funds held and disbursed by him under the Rules and Regulations of War.

Mr. HOWE. I did not understand those qualifications; but I understand them now perfectly well, and I think I am authorized to say to the Senator from Ohio that the Attorney-General did not decide any such thing. I understand the Attorney-General to hold distinctly, in the very letter from which the Senator read, that not only a major-general may be tried by court-martial, but that every officer of the Army subordinate to him may also be tried in that way; but the difficulty that occurred to the Attorney-General was, that not all the officers, not all the subordinates, of the Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau were officers of the Army. Some of the minor officers were civilians, and the difficulty he found in this clause of the resolution was that it was general; that it required that all disbursements made by officers, whether civil or military, should be accounted for in the way pointed out in the resolution. His difficulty was whether that resolution would authorize the trial of civilians employed in the Freedmen's Bureau; not at all as to whether it would authorize the trial of any one of the officers of the Army by a military court.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. It has been stated here that the statute of limitations has run, so that there can be no court-martial. If that is true——

Mr. HOWE. I was going to refer to that very point. The Senator from Ohio, doubtless for good reasons, has read from the communication addressed by the Secretary of War to the Speaker of the House some of the charges made against the late Commissioner of the Freedmen's Bureau, and they are very grave unquestionably; and he expressed a good deal of surprise that this man, who was an officer in the Army, has not already been ordered before a court and put upon his trial. Now, upon that point—my attention is called to it now for the first time, that is, to the documents bearing upon it—the Secretary of War, it seems, addressed this letter to the Speaker of the House on the 4th of December last. The report made by the Adjutant-General was dated some time in August, and the Secretary himself assigns the reasons which have prevented this officer from being ordered before a court, and does it in these words:

Though it is true that he—

could now be brought before a military court on some specific charges, yet, for the reason that they would be more or less dependent on transactions which are barred, the trial would hardly be productive of public benefit; and also for the reason that the honorable House of Representatives has already ordered and had an investigation by a committee upon the affairs of the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, I have deemed it best not to give the case to a military tribunal, but to submit it and the entire subject to the House of Representatives.

I have stated that these facts were laid before him only in August last, upon the report of the Adjutant-General of the Army, and this communication was addressed to the Speaker of the House on the 4th of December, and I think the session opened on the first, within three days after the session convened.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator now allow me my question? From the statement of the Secretary of War it seems that the transactions are so barred that a trial by court-martial would amount to nothing. The question I ask is this: Suppose a court of inquiry should find him guilty, what can come of it? Can anything be done about it? We cannot pass a law now, without the violation of a fundamental principle, authorizing him to be tried by a court-martial, because it would be ex post facto in its character. What can come of it? Suppose the court of inquiry find him guilty, what does it amount to?

Mr. HOWE. Of course I cannot answer that. I do not know how much of the case is barred by the statute of limitations. I do not know how much the inquiry would be restricted if placed before a military court at the present time. I read what the Secretary says, with the controlling reasons upon his mind, and which prevented him from ordering the officer before a court at once. Those reasons are good or bad. We need not doubt as to why he has done as he did.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I can answer the question of the Senator from Indiana, I think. A court of inquiry can only furnish the testimony, the facts; they do not inflict punishment. They find the testimony and the facts in the premises preliminary to a court-martial; but if the statute of limitations should bar the trial of General Howard by a court-martial, and the facts elicited by a court of inquiry should be of such a character as would dismiss him from the Army before a court-martial, as I said awhile ago, there is then a tribunal that can act, and that is the Congress of the United States Upon the facts as found by the court of inquiry, if they were sufficient, the Congress of the United States by a resolution could dismiss him from the Army in disgrace.

Mr. MORTON. That brings me to the very point, if the Senator from Illinois will excuse me. Any action of Congress providing for a trial by court-martial or for dismissing an officer for an offense that is barred is in its nature ex post facto. Now the Constitution does not forbid Congress from passing an ex post facto law, as it does a State; but still there never has been but one in the history of the Government.

Mr. LOGAN. This action of Congress would be in the event that a court-martial could not act. Congress certainly can act. It does not make any difference how long the offense has been committed by an officer of the Army, if committed when in the Army, when it is discovered—there is no question about it in the world.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, obtained the floor.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope the Senator from Maine will allow me to correct an error that I committed. This report I saw for the first time since this resolution was taken up, and in looking further along in the opinion of the Attorney-General I find that its meaning is properly apprehended by the Senator from Wisconsin. Reading only the passages that I saw, it seemed to me it had no other meaning than that which I gave to it; but further along in the opinion I see that he does express himself as the Senator from Wisconsin has stated, and therefore it is but justice to him that I should say so.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want to say a word in reply to a remark that fell from the Senator from Ohio. I was very glad to hear the Senator say that he would vote for this inquiry, and only regretted that he should enter so much at large upon the character of the charges preferred by the Secretary of War, and particularly as to the delay in the appointment of this commission or court of inquiry. I know my friend does not desire to prejudice the case of this distinguished officer by any remarks here, and yet he must know, if he has glanced simply at these charges, how easily capable, under the circumstances, they are of explanation, without involving the moral character of this distinguished officer at all. Not a single charge there lies at his door by any necessary implication of law or logic. He may have discharged his high trust, as I believe it will turn out to be, with entire rectitude—that rectitude which belongs to his character and his reputation through life up to this time—and be entirely free from any of the defalcations which appear in these charges.

Under these circumstances I regret exceedingly that my honorable friend should have thought in necessary to accompany his declaration that he would vote for this court of inquiry with an array of charges calculated to prejudice the case in the minds of this court. And I felt a little surprised that my honorable friend should think it necessary under these circumstances to arraign other parties, seeming to intimate that others besides General Howard should go before a court-martial—the President, the Secretary of War, and I do not know but the Attorney-General. What possible connection does my honorable friend suppose any of those men have had with this Bureau? Does he not know that this Bureau, and all these facts, antedate the advent of these parties into power? Certainly they did. Why then should they be arraigned? Why is it necessary to do so? Does it throw any light on this subject? Does it help to relieve this question? No. Possibly it may have some relation to something else than this; it may have some political status in some court we do not know of, that may be organized between this and 1876, here or hereabouts, or something of that sort; but so far as this particular measure is concerned it has not the slightest connection with it in the world, as I think my honorable friend will admit. All that is outside of this case; and the whole comment I do not say is designed—I know it is not—but calculated to prejudice this case.

"Why is it here, why was it not examined before, why was it not sent to Congress?" the Senator inquires. For the obvious reason, in the first place, that Congress had taken jurisdiction of the question a year ago.

Mr. THURMAN. I did not ask why it was not sent to Congress.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Well, why had not the President examined it before? This matter came to the observation of the President or the Secretary of War at a very recent period; but before that time charges had been made in another branch of this Government at the other end of this Capitol, and by a committee of that body examined, and no fault found against this man whatever, either of a moral or legal character. Of course, as Congress had taken jurisdiction of the subject, it was the most proper thing in the world that the President should say, "Turn it over to Congress; as Congress has begun it, let Congress finish it."

Now, why should not this inquiry be made? My friend by my side [Mr. MORTON] says it will result in nothing. I say it will result in much. This man is under a cloud. Here is a distinguished officer of the United States, in whose reputation and character we all have a just pride; a man who entitled himself to honor, who entitled himself to the good wishes of his countrymen; conspicuous in war, maimed, and will go down to his grave maimed, in a very worthy service; a man whose reputation up to this time has been as spotless as that of any man living. He is under a cloud. It is said that this investigation will result in no legal proceedings thereafter. Suppose that were so; is it not an object to relieve this man from this cloud which hangs over him? Have we no duty in this case to him and to the Department? Has not my honorable friend made this investigation absolutely necessary by his voice in denunciation here this afternoon? Has he not called the attention of the country to this very case in a way and in a manner to give it emphasis, which will go from one end of the country to the other?

It may be said that it has been examined in the House of Representatives; but there are plenty of men who say that is only whitewashing. Now it is attempted to take it out of the political jurisdiction and transfer it to the military, to a commission instituted by the President, and instituted under circumstances where there shall be no politics in it, unless people choose to thrust them in. I think, therefore, it is eminently fit, and there are considerations enough of a moral character, to send this matter to such a commission, and with it send good deliverance to this man, so be it that the facts in this case justify it; and I am sure we shall all so pray for such a deliverance.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. O no; let us pass this resolution. There will be no division upon it.

Mr. ANTHONY. If we can pass the resolution I will not press the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator withdraw the motion?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes, sir.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The resolution was read the third time and passed.

Whereas the Constitution of the United States charges Congress with the duty of providing for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia of the several States, and Congress did, in pursuance thereof, on the 23d day of April, 1808, pass a law making a permanent annual appropriation of $200,000 to provide arms as aforesaid, to be apportioned among the several States; and whereas the population of the United States has increased since that period from eight millions to over forty millions, and the cost of labor and material in the manufacture of ordnance stores has advanced so that the quota of this State has become reduced to a number entirely inadequate to meet the wants of the organized militia companies, thereby imposing an onerous charge upon the treasury of this State to meet the necessary requirements; and whereas the governor of this State, in his annual message to the Legislature, has called attention to the necessity of providing additional means for arming the militia with the improved breech-loading arms, and to a bill now pending before Congress, for making the permanent annual appropriation $1,000,000, for the purpose of providing arms and ordnance stores for the whole body of the militia of the United States: Therefore,

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen of the House will observe that a large margin has been granted in reference to the submission of bills on Monday. The Chair has extended it beyond what the rules suggest, and has endeavored to prevent the offering of bills during the week, several times having requested members of the House to confine themselves to Monday. Hereafter he will require any gentleman desiring to refer a bill during the week to state the exigency why the bill cannot remain to the following Monday. That is fair. The Chair will rigidly insist on that rule.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, before sending to the Clerk's desk the papers I now hold in my hand, I ask the consent of the House to make a statement. These papers have reference to the affairs of the District of Columbia.

I have here four memorials touching the affairs of the District of Columbia, which have been handed to me with the request that I would submit them to the House with a resolution asking for a joint select committee touching the investigation of the affairs of this District. One of these memorials is by Columbus Alexander and others, residents of the District, and property-holders here, as I am informed; another is by W. W. Corcoran, G. W. Riggs, and others, with reference to the same subject; another is by Columbus Alexander, for himself and his associates; and the other is a memorial which was presented by the governor of this District to the Senate a few days ago, with reference to which perhaps we are familiar, and which has been made an exhibit to the last memorial to which I have referred. Before sending these papers to the Clerk's desk, and submitting a motion to suspend the rules and pass the resolution which will accompany them, I desire to say a word in regard to my attempt to get the floor on last Monday with reference to this same subject, in relation to which some erroneous impressions have existed and publications made reflecting on the Speaker of this House.

Two of these memorials were placed in my hands, on last Monday, with the request that on that day I should present them to the House. I did endeavor to present them to the House. I sought for a considerable time to get the floor, in common with a great many other gentlemen, and in common with them I was disappointed in procuring it. Finally, just before the West Virginia election cases came up, when there was some matter pending before the House, I forget what, I went to the Speaker and told him what I had been requested to do, and that I desired to get the floor, for the purpose of submitting a resolution to the House. The Speaker then informed me that there was a great pressure for the floor; that a number of gentlemen had been seeking it; but that after the matter which was then pending was disposed of he would try to recognize me; and, also, in the same connection he stated to me that he desired very much to recognize my friend from Minnesota, who sits on my left, [Mr. DUNNELL,] and that he would endeavor to give us the floor.

Immediately after that, or soon after I had returned to my seat, I received information that the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SMITH,] the chairman of the Committee on Elections, was insisting upon it that the Speaker should recognize him for the purpose of bringing up the West Virginia election cases, which had been under discussion for several days. I then came to the conclusion that the Speaker would not feel himself warranted in withholding a motion from the House to take up those cases, and I abandoned the idea of getting the floor for the present. I did, however, seek the floor, but the Speaker recognized the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SMITH,] and the House took up the West Virginia election cases and proceeded with them.

I went back to the Speaker after the House had taken up these cases and had another conversation with him upon the subject. He told me then that if, after the House had passed from the consideration of the election cases that afternoon, I desired and was willing to take the risk of submitting the matter to a thin House he would give me the floor that afternoon; but if I did not choose to have it then I would have the first recognition to-day for the purpose of bringing the matter to the consideration of the House.

All this occurred between the Speaker and myself on last Monday, before there had been any sort of comment upon the subject. I desire to state to the House, as I stated but a moment ago, that the Speaker informed me that if I would submit the question to a thin House after the House had passed from the consideration of the West Virginia election cases he would give me the floor for that purpose. I did not think it prudent under the circumstances to take it then, and preferred to wait till this morning. I stated to the Speaker that I would wait till this morning; and with that arrangement I now have the floor.

I make this statement in justice to the Speaker and in justice to myself. And I want to say one word further in justice to myself with reference to this matter being in my hands at all. It is not a matter of my seeking. It came to my hands unexpectedly, and I had no expectation that I should be selected for the purpose of bringing it to the attention of the House. But it having been offered to me, and there having been so much said in the public press in reference to the affairs of the District of Columbia, especially in that part of the country which I in part represent, I did not feel that I could refuse; indeed I felt it to be my duty when a matter of this kind was brought to my notice with the request that I should submit it to the House, to do so. Not that I desire to have anything to do with an investigation of this kind. I have had enough to do with these investigations to know that the duties are thankless in their character and that they involve an immense amount of very hard labor.

But I said to these gentlemen when these memorials came into my hands that so far as their mere local affairs were concerned, and their mere matters of local taxation, it was not a subject that affected the interests of my constituents, or of the tax-payers of the country at large; but that there was a subject connected with it with reference to which my constituents and the people of the whole country had an interest, and that was this: That it was understood that this Congress was to be called upon to appropriate about four and a half million dollars, in consequence of the improvements that had been made in the District of Columbia; and therefore that, if I submitted a resolution to this House, I should incorporate in that resolution the provision that this joint select committee, if appointed, should take into consideration that question, and inform the Congress of the United States and the country whether or not there was any just ground upon which Congress could be called upon to vote this enormous sum of money, or any other sum of money, out of the Treasury of the United States, and with that understanding, and with that statement to these gentlemen, I took their memorial and resolution. I now send them to the Clerk's desk with the accompanying resolution, and I move that the rules be suspended and the resolution passed.

The SPEAKER. In connection with what the gentleman from Indiana has just said, the Chair desires to make one general observation, and that is that gentlemen seeking the floor for a suspension of the rules on Monday greatly facilitate their ends by notifying the Speaker of the object they have in view. There is, every Monday, a much larger number seeking the floor than can be accommodated in a single day, and the Chair must necessarily exercise discretion in assigning the floor, having regard primarily to the relative public importance of the questions presented by different members. The Chair thinks that in his five years' service no member from either side of the House, having a question of public importance to submit, has ever failed to get the floor when the Chair was advised of the object. Had the Chair known what motion the gentleman from Indiana intended to submit on Monday last, it would have been his duty as well as his pleasure to recognize him.

The rules provide that the member first addressing the Chair shall be recognized; but where fifteen or twenty address him at the same moment, some other mode of assigning the floor must, of necessity, be resorted to; and there is none so fair as to award precedence according to the relative importance of the motions; and this decision can be made only by the Speaker knowing what subject a member seeking the floor proposes to submit to the House. To show how well this rule works the Chair begs to repeat that he has never heard a complaint that any matter of importance failed to reach the attention of the House.

The resolution of the gentleman from Indiana will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of America in Congress assembled, That a joint select committee be appointed, consisting of three Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and five members of the House, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the matters specified in the petition of W. W. Corcoran and others; whether unlawful contracts have been made for improvements in the District of Columbia; whether unlawful assessments and taxes have been levied; the actual cost of such improvements; the amount agreed to be paid therefor; whether correct measurements have been made; the existing indebtedness thereof, and what, if any, portion of such indebtedness was created on account of Government property, and may be properly paid out of the Treasury of the United States; that said committee shall have power to employ a clerk and stenographer, to administer oaths, and send for persons and papers, and shall report to the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I would inquire whether it is in conformity with custom to specify the number of members of the Senate who should be appointed on a committee like this?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, in the first place, that this should be a concurrent resolution, and not a joint resolution, and the Chair will so regard it. The usage has been both ways; but propriety dictates that the House should allow the Senate to name what number they choose to constitute their share of the joint committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the question whether the authorization for the employment of a stenographer of a joint committee like this applies to the stenographers of the House; would they be required to do the work?

The Committee on Appropriations were informed this morning that the stenographers of the committees of the House are much overburdened with work, and the question of their compensation is under consideration. I would like to know from the mover of this resolution, or from the Speaker, whether this resolution would throw this additional work upon the stenographers of the House.

The SPEAKER. Heretofore the custom has been that where a joint committee is authorized to employ a stenographer, they employ an independent stenographer, and that would be the construction, the Chair thinks, of this resolution.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to ask the gentleman who moves this resolution to allow one clause to be added to it, and it is this: "and to inquire what amendment of the organic act is necessary to further protect the people and the disbursement of the moneys of the District." I do it for this reason. The school-teachers in this District have not been paid since September; no part of the taxes raised have been appropriated in that direction at all. I am informed that the school fund is mixed up in the treasury with the general fund, and I therefore suggest that as the committee are going into this whole subject they inquire what amendment of the organic act is necessary to further protect the rights of the people or to control the disbursement of moneys.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I would call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa to the fact that there is before the Judiciary Committee a resolution on this subject, and they are going into an inquiry as to the laws regulating the District of Columbia, and as to the relations that the District of Columbia bears to the General Government.

Mr. KASSON. That may be true, but the attention of this particular committee is to be to specific evils, and I think they ought to be permitted to inquire into this matter as well as the others named in the resolution, as they would be more likely to do it thoroughly than would the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I have no personal objection to the amendment. As originally drawn it meets the case made by the several memorials.

Mr. KASSON. Let them have authority to report such amendment as may be necessary to the organic act.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I have no objection whatever to that.

Mr. COX. Some of the Metropolitan police have been to see me to-day, and they have not been paid since June last. Their fund is somewhat mixed up with the general fund; at least I am informed so.

Congress, by a law passed on the 3d of March last, appropriated some $207,000 to pay the Metropolitan police, provided the sum of $100,000 or more was raised by a tax levied in this city. The police have been paid the amount appropriated by Congress, but no amount has been derived from a tax levied by the city. Yet by that law the appropriation by Congress was made on the condition that this tax should be levied by the city. These policemen have not been paid, as I have said, since June or May last. I would like to have this subject also investigated by the proposed joint select commitcee among the rest of their investigations.

I shall offer, when the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] shall have been adopted, a resolution referring to this action by Congress, and ask that my resolution may be referred to that committee for investigation likewise. I think the same course might be properly taken in respect to the school-teachers and the school fund of the District. I suggest that all these matters may be referred to the joint committee when raised.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I have brought to the attention of the House these matters to which my attention has been called. These abuses to which the gentleman refers, if there have been any such, I have never heard of.

Mr. COX. I do not speak of my own knowledge; I only speak from information given to me.

Mr. POLAND. Much that my friend from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] said in his remarks before offering this resolution was in its nature personal, having more reference to himself and the Speaker and to newspapers than to his resolution.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. POLAND] will elevate his voice a little we can hear him better.

Mr. POLAND. If other persons will lower theirs it would answer the same purpose, perhaps.

I desire to say a word or two in the line of the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. WILSON.]

On last Monday I offered a resolution directing the Committee on the Judiciary of this House to inquire into the legal relations between the General Government and the government of the District of Columbia, and to see whether anything could be ascertained by which a basis could be found for dividing public expenditure here between the General Government and the government of the District of Columbia. My friend from Indiana alluded to what had been said in the newspapers in relation to his attempt on last Monday to offer the resolution which he now offers. In that very connection I desire to say a word in reference to what I have seen in the newspapers coupling his offer, which it seems was not successful, with mine, which was.

It is very true that the resolution that I offered, and which was adopted by more than two-thirds of this House, was not drawn by me. It was offered at the desire and request of various people of this District, and I do not suppose that that desire to have the General Government bear as large a proportion of the expenditure here as they will is confined to any one class of people in this District. However much they may disagree in other respects, I think that they are all abundantly willing that the General Government shall do their full share toward the public expenditure here.

It has been said, and said in connection with the resolution which my friend now offers, and which he desired to offer last Monday—it has been said by some gentleman who I suppose is now within the sound of my voice, that the very purpose and object of the resolution which I offered was to cover up a great variety of frauds and corruption in this District, and that he understood that I had the report already drawn that was to be presented to Congress upon that subject.

Mr. Speaker, I do not suppose that any report would be presented upon the subject until it should be considered by the Committee on the Judiciary. Precisely what report the Committee on the Judiciary would see fit to make after they had made inquiry into the subject was more than I knew then, and is more than I know now.

The resolution that I offered was upon its face, as I thought, entirely innocent. If any information could be derived by an inquiry by the Committee on the Judiciary that would be beneficial to the people of this District, and would show that the General Government ought to do more than they had done toward the public expenditure here, the people of this District were entitled to the benefit of it. If, on the other hand, the inquiry by the Committee on the Judiciary, and the report by them, will show that the General Government had done more than their share, then the General Government was entitled to the benefit of that showing. I am not aware that any member of the Committee on the Judiciary desires, certainly I have no desire, to have it so appear, that the General Government should do more than they have done, unless there is something to be disclosed by the inquiry into this matter that shall make it right for it to do so.

In relation to this particular resolution offered by my friend from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] it seems to me that instead of this cumbrous machinery of a joint committee of the two Houses it would he altogether better to have the subject referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I know no reason why an affair that applies so exclusively to the District of Columbia as this does should not be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Certainly the gentleman who will have the conduct of the investigation, the charge of it, my friend from New York, [Mr. HALE,] who is chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, is quite as competent to conduct an investigation thoroughly and fairly as any man on this floor. It seems to me altogether more appropriate that this subject should be referred to that committee than to have this machinery of a joint committee of the two Houses. I suppose it is not in order to move an amendment to a motion to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules is not amendable.

Mr. POLAND. I suggest to my friend from Indiana whether the course which I have indicated is not the most advisable?

Mr. HALE, of New York. I ask permission to say a word on this resolution. I have had no opportunity to consult my colleagues on the District Committee, with the single exception of the Delegate from the District, [Mr. CHIPMAN,] who is a member of the committee under the standing rule of the House, and who has expressed to me his own ideas on this subject. The resolution, as introduced, covers certain matters which are undoubtedly strictly within the ordinary province of the standing Committee on the District of Columbia in this House, and the corresponding standing committee on the part of the Senate. The resolution contains also a reference to other matters, which I think are not within the scope of the jurisdiction of that committee, except by special order of the House.

The Delegate from the District has indicated to me his entire unwillingness to be put, or to have the Committee on the District put, in any position which by any fair construction can give rise to the imputation of a disposition to suppress any investigation of the affairs of the District. Certainly, so far as I am concerned, nothing is further from me than any disposition of that kind. So far, therefore, as regards the investigation into frauds in contracts——

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I rise to a point of order. It is impossible for us in this part of the House to hear the gentleman, unless we leave our seats for the purpose.

The SPEAKER. The House is at present unusually quiet; the difficulty of hearing is not owing to any disorder now prevailing. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] must address his suggestion to the gentleman who is speaking.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I desire to get the gentleman back to his own seat and to have him speak a little louder.

Mr. HALE, of New York. The first point the gentleman can carry; the second I fear he cannot.

The SPEAKER. It is not within the power of the Chair to dictate the tone of voice in which gentlemen shall address the House.

Mr. HALE, of New York. So far, therefore, as concerns these matters outside the ordinary and legitimate province of the committee, I for one very much prefer that they should go to a select committee, instead of the standing Committee on the District. Whether this select committee shall be a joint committee or one made up from this House, I am entirely indifferent.

The subject of the extent of the indebtedness of the District and the liability of the United States for any part of that indebtedness is so intimately connected with the other subjects of inquiry named in the resolution, that I can see no good reason for separating these matters. I therefore say with entire frankness, so far as I am concerned—and I apprehend that in this I speak the general sentiment of the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman—that they certainly are entirely willing that these matters of investigation should be intrusted by the House to a select committee instead of the standing committee for the District.

Other suggestions have been made by different gentlemen upon the floor, among others the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] and my colleague from New York, [Mr. COX,] which strike me as not properly and directly connected with the subject of inquiry on which the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana is based. Hence, it seems to me, they may properly be omitted from this resolution, and that if any inquiry is to be made, it may be had in the ordinary course—through the standing committees of the House.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Mr. Speaker, in connection with the suggestion of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. POLAND,] that this matter should be referred to the District Committee, I have but a word to say. Several of the present members of that committee were on the same committee in the last Congress; and some, perhaps most of the subjects referred to in this resolution, or its specifications at least, were before the District Committee of the last Congress, and were by them, in my judgment, fully, carefully, and candidly considered, and a conclusion was reached by several of the members of the present committee upon those very questions. Whether that conclusion was right or wrong it is not for me now to say; but so far as I am concerned I very much prefer that some other committee than the standing Committee for the District of Columbia should make what further investigation this House and the Senate may determine ought to be made. We spent a very long time in the investigation of several of the questions now brought before the House, and, so far as I am concerned, I reached a conclusion which still commends itself to my judgment. I think, therefore, that I am not a proper person to investigate again those questions; and I hope that if an investigation is to be had, it will be done by a select committee.

I do not believe that any committee that can be appointed in this House or in the Senate will ever satisfy the persons who are complaining. If a committee of angels of the first magnitude were appointed I have no idea these persons would ever be satisfied with their report, or that the difference existing between those who ask investigation and those who are to be investigated will ever be reconciled. That is an impossibility. I do not myself wish to go through with a three months' examination again. I helped to make one fair, candid, and just examination of the affairs of this District, and I came to conclusions which I think will not be changed unless an examination by gentlemen in whom I have confidence should develop facts which were never presented in the examination made during the last Congress. I hope, therefore, that this matter will be referred to a select committee.

Mr. LEACH. I wish to ask the gentleman when that former investigation was concluded, and what was the result of it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It is not necessary for me to state the result. I suppose that the report as made by the committee is accessible to every member of the House; and perhaps every gentleman here who has interested himself at all about the matter knows precisely what that report was. So, at all events, my friend can find much more satisfactorily to himself in the report what the conclusions were which were reached than by any statement I can make at the present moment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I wish the gentleman from Wisconsin, before he takes his seat, would state how long a time the committee were engaged in making the investigation.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The investigation lasted during a period, I think, of nearly three months; not all the time, but often during every day in the week, and with a patience, a perseverance, and a thoroughness I never saw equaled in any investigation of which I have any knowledge; and I have had pretty large experience in that way. Counsel, two or three for the complainants, were allowed and heard at great length for the memorialists; and counsel on behalf of the District authorities were also. The investigation was not only lengthy, but thorough, patient, persevering, and exhaustive. Every fact which could bear at all upon the subject, I believe, was elicited. I do not believe anything was left out.

Mr. SPEER. But two years have elapsed since that investigation was made.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Yes, sir. And I do not wish it to be understood here or elsewhere that I am opposed to investigation. I am in favor of it. I have said this morning to those interested one way or the other that I desire it shall be made; that I should vote for it; and I desire it shall be made by gentlemen in whom this House and the country have confidence; that it shall be as thorough and as complete as it can possibly be made.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I desire to address an inquiry to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] who offered the resolution. I would like to ask him, as a lawyer, whether there is anything in this subject-matter, in reference to which he desires investigation, that is not proper matter for the properly organized courts of this District to investigate?

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me while asking this question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa makes objection to further debate.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his objection when debate has been allowed to run on so long. I do not wish to occupy time unnecessarily, but only for a minute or two.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to object, and if he insists upon his objection the Chair must enforce it.

Mr. NIBLACK. I trust the gentleman from Iowa will withdraw his objection and allow me to make a suggestion to my colleague before the vote is taken.

The SPEAKER. The House is well aware that a motion to suspend the rules is not debatable, and the debate so far has proceeded by general consent.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will not insist on stopping the debate after he has allowed it to go on to the present time.

Mr. NIBLACK. I also wish to make a suggestion, and it is this——

Mr. LOUGHRIDGE. If it be the wish of the House that the debate should proceed I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa having withdrawn his objection, the gentleman from Virginia is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I do not want more than a minute or two, and I am glad the gentleman has withdrawn his objection. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, these memorialists, who I understand are among the largest property-holders in this District and who have so far refused to pay the taxes assessed by the District government, are attempting to evade the expense it might cost them to go into a court of justice to have these matters properly investigated. They have already compelled the House to spend three months of time and a large amount of money.

Mr. SPEER. I object to any discussion of the merits of the resolution.

Mr. SENER. O, no; let him go on.

Mr. SPEER. I object to a discussion of the merits of the resolution, or the making of an attack upon these memorialists.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I am not making an attack upon the memorialists.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to a verbal correction in his resolution. It speaks of the memorials of W. W. Corcoran and others. I find two memorials in which his name does not appear, and in the other it is not at the head of the list. I suggest, therefore, that he should say in the resolution, the memorial of John B. Clagett and others.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. If objection is made to my going on, then I shall object to any further debate.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I hope the House will give me one minute.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I wish to say one word.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I do not mean to say anything on the merits of the resolution.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. My friend from Vermont has made reference to the sending of this to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Other gentlemen have spoken on the same subject. I desire simply to say that in presenting this resolution asking for a joint select committee of the two Houses I had no purpose to cast reflections upon the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I insist on my objection to any debate whatever. If gentlemen insist on their objection to my going on, I demand the regular order, and object to anybody else proceeding.

Mr. SPEER. You were making an attack on these memorialists.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. No, sir; I was not making an attack upon these memorialists.

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I simply offered the resolution in that form because the memorialists asked for a resolution of that kind.

Mr. NIBLACK. I suggest to my colleague that he let the memorial and resolution go to a select committee.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I object to any debate whatever.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I ask the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PLATT] to yield to me for just one minute.

Mr. HALE, of New York. I think it is only right that, when the Delegate from the District asks to be heard on a matter of this kind, the House should allow him a hearing.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. If I am taken off the floor, I must object to the privilege being given to other gentlemen which is denied to me.

Mr. CHIPMAN. I ask the Chair whether I have been recognized?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PLATT] insisting upon his objection, it is not within the province of the Chair to recognize the gentleman from the District of Columbia.

Mr. PLATT, of Virginia. I withdraw my objection so far as it relates to that gentleman.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Mr. Speaker, there never has been a minute since the new District government was organized that it has not been under fire. The indications are that it is under fire now. I only desire to say on behalf of the officers of the District, and I do it authoritatively, that they have never objected to any investigation that Congress has seen fit to order with regard to the affairs of the District; they never will object to any such investigation and they do not now.

In reply to the observation of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] in regard to the school fund of this District, I wish to inform the House that, while the gentleman was speaking, a memorandum was sent to me by one of the audience, a trustee of the public schools, stating that the question had been recently investigated by the board of school trustees, and that it was found that instead of money having been diverted, as is stated by the public press, the money is deficient, that there are not funds enough in the treasury to pay the school-teachers; and some day I intend to tell the House its duties in regard to the schools. I only wish at present, on behalf of myself and the officers of the District, to say that there is no desire on my part or theirs to shield them from any investigation on this floor. And I wish, also, to repeat that there has not been money enough in the treasury to pay the school-teachers.

Mr. COX. How in regard to the Metropolitan-police fund?

Mr. CHIPMAN. I am informed that the same is true in regard to that as in regard to the other fund. As to this investigation, I say, go on, if you choose to occupy your time in that way. It is suggested by a gentleman on my left that this deficiency has arisen from some neglect on the part of the tax-payers to pay the taxes. That is true. The tax is deficient, both in that respect and in respect to the levy. The levy is not large enough, nor have all the taxes been paid. There is no objection on the part of any officers of the local government to any investigation which Congress may see fit to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WILSON] will state what he intends to do in reference to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. I have no objection to accepting that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The proposed amendment by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And inquire and report what amendments of the organic act, if any, are necessary to further protect the rights of citizens, or regulate the disbursements and collection of moneys.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana has the right to modify his own resolution, and what has been read will be considered as part of it.

Mr. NEGLEY. Has the gentleman from Indiana a right to accept an amendment if objected to?

The SPEAKER. Of course. Before the resolution is voted on it is absolutely within his own control. But the Chair would rule—and that may be a new ruling—that after the seconding the gentleman would not have the right to modify his resolution, because the analogy of the previous question would cut him off.

Mr. RICE. Before this resolution is submitted to a vote, I would suggest to the gentleman from Indiana to make an amendment to it. It is only a few days since that this House by its order authorized the Committee on the District of Columbia to appoint an accountant, who was sent for from a distant State. He has come to the District of Columbia, and has been busily engaged for the past month or six weeks in going over all the accounts of the different governments in this District since 1802; and the proposition was that he should bring them down to the present day for action in this House.

Now, sir, if on every day we are to have the complaint of some dissatisfied citizen of the District of Columbia, who refuses to go before the lawful authority of the District, and hopes to reach his aim by coming into this House—if that is to be the order of things I hope that with that resolution will be coupled the order to withdraw the question of that action from the Committee on the District of Columbia, and place it under the charge of this select committee. It is by no means fitting that the action of the House should be so divided, and I hope that that will be coupled with this resolution.

Mr. NEGLEY. I have risen on several occasions to ask the gentleman from Indiana to state to the House the reason he has for presenting this memorial.

The SPEAKER. That would be in the nature of debate, to which objection is made.

The question was on seconding the motion of Mr. WILSON, of Indiana, to suspend the rules and pass his resolution as modified.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WILSON of Indiana, and Mr. NEGLEY, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 129, noes not counted.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The rules were then suspended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) and the resolution was adopted.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] who has asked for three days' leave of absence, desires to be excused from service upon the committee of conference on the resolution in regard to furnishing the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to Senators and Members. The Chair will name Mr. SPEER, of Pennsylvania, to act upon that committee in the place of his colleague.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. STONE. I ask leave to submit the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the report of Charles W. Howell, captain of engineers, United States Army, made to Brigadier-General A. A. Humphreys, Chief of Engineers United States Army, for the year ending June 30, 1873, of the work being done at the mouth of the Mississippi River, recites, among other things, that his project for the year ending June 30, 1874, is to continue the work as heretofore, exercising what may appear proper discretion in regard to time of dredging, and the continuing of the surveys for the benefit of commerce; that the work now being done is not susceptible of permanent completion, and will require annual appropriations for its maintenance; that the failure to make appropriations would result in ruin or serious crippling of all the interests fostered by past appropriations; and whereas the work is embarrassed and even destroyed by causes beyond the control of the engineer in charge of the work by a powerful monopoly known as the "Tow-Boat Association," domiciled in New Orleans, controlling its commerce, opposed to improvements of the channels across the bars at the mouth of the Mississippi River, and having it in its power at any time to render valueless any improvements attempted; and whereas the said Tow-Boat Association did compel C. W. Howell, captain of engineers, United States Army, during the month of March, 1873, to abandon work in the Southwest Pass of the Mississippi River, after deepening the channel to eighteen feet, by running one of the deepest draught ships in port on the side of the channel, grounding and abandoning her, thus completely blocking it; and whereas when the bars are improved, small tug-boats cannot successfully compete with the Tow-Boat Association; that this association derives a large income from tugging at grounded vessels, a considerable income from lightering vessels that may be run too hard aground to be towed off, and when business is brisk a large percentage by having ships bid for the first tow in or out, together with other minor sources of revenue; and whereas when the bars are improved, towing is thrown open to competition, with consequent reduction of rates, the Tow-Boat Association, deprived of the revenue derived from tugging at grounded vessels, lightering vessels, and the percentage obtained for the first tow in or out; and whereas C. W. Howell, captain of engineers, United States Army, is powerless to fight successfully this Tow-Boat Association, owing to the fact that there is no law to which he can turn for help, notwithstanding he has means at his command abundantly able to overcome all natural obstacles to the formation and maintenance of a good channel at the mouth of the Mississippi River; and whereas this Congress owes it to the people it represents to put an end to malicious destruction to works of river and harbor improvement, which involve the ruin of a great commerce: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be, and is hereby, instructed to report a bill to facilitate the execution of and to protect public works of river and harbor improvements, to the end that private individuals and corporations may not destroy such works without incurring suitable penalties; as also an appropriation of not less than $150,000 to continue the work of improving the bars at the mouth of the Mississippi River, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875.

Mr. NEGLEY. I would ask the gentlemen from Missouri whether he offers this as a report from any committee, or whether it has been before any committee?

Mr. STONE. It has not been before any committee.

Mr. NEGLEY. Then I would ask the gentleman to have it referred to the Committee on Commerce, which is now considering this very question.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to ask the gentleman to leave out the last clause of the resolution, which instructs the committee to report an appropriation.

Mr. STONE. I prefer to ask action on the resolution at once.

Mr. NEGLEY. I trust the House will not agree to such a monstrous proposition.

The question was taken upon seconding the motion for the suspension of the rules; and, on a division, there were 57 in the affirmative.

Mr. STONE. I consent to the modification, and will strike out the last clause of the resolution, relating to an appropriation.

Mr. O'NEILL. I hope the resolution will be referred. I wish to state to the gentleman that there are statements contained in that preamble and resolution which some of my constituents want an opportunity to disprove.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. In what respect does the gentleman modify his resolution?

Mr. STONE. By striking out the last clause of it, relating to an appropriation.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is the usual appropriation, at any rate.

Mr. O'NEILL. I hope the House will not pass this resolution even as modified.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to debate.

Mr. SHELDON. I hope the House will listen to a suggestion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana objects to debate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not object to hearing the suggestion of the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. SHELDON. As I understand the preamble to the resolution, it alleges facts, and if we pass it it will be assuming that they are facts. I have no objection to the resolution, if the gentleman will insert after the word "whereas" the words "it is alleged."

Mr. O'NEILL. The statement in relation to the tow-boat company is most emphatically denied.

Mr. STONE. I will modify the preamble to the resolution by inserting after the word "whereas," where it occurs, the words "it is alleged."

Mr. NEGLEY. I hope the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and I shall object to any amendments of the resolution.

Mr. O'NEILL. I hope the whole thing will be voted down.

Tellers were ordered on seconding the motion to suspend the rules, and Mr. STONE and Mr. O'NEILL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 144, noes not counted; so there was a second.

The question was then taken upon suspending the rules and passing the preamble and resolution; and, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the preamble and resolution were agreed to.

JUDGE BUSTEED.

Mr. WHITE, by unanimous consent, presented articles of impeachment against Richard Busteed, judge of the district court of the United States for the district of Alabama, and moved that the same be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL LAND DISTRICT IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk, as a report from the Committee on the Public Lands, be considered at the present time.

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. No. 429) creating an additional land district in the Territory of New Mexico. It provides that all that portion of the Territory of New Mexico lying south of the principal base line of said Territory shall constitute a separate land district, to be called the La Messilla land district, the office of which shall be located at such place in said district as the President of the United States may direct, which may be changed from time to time as the public interest may require. Section 2 provides that the President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a register and receiver of public moneys for said district, and said officers shall reside in the place where said land office is located, and they shall have the same powers, perform the same duties, and receive the same emoluments as are or may be prescribed by law in relation to land offices of the United States in other Territories.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask unanimous consent to make a single statement in explanation of this bill. There is but one land office in the Territory of New Mexico, while there are four land offices in Arizona. It is two hundred and fifty miles from the point where settlements are now being made in the Territory to the land office at Santa Fé. I have reported this bill at the request of the Delegate from New Mexico. The Committee on the Public Lands have considered this bill, and are unanimously of opinion that its passage is a public necessity, for it now costs a settler $100 or more to make the proper entry at Santa Fé of his land.

The motion of Mr. DUNNELL was seconded.

The rules were then suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the bill was passed.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE BY RAILROAD.

Mr. McCRARY. I am instructed by the Committee on Railways and Canals to report a resolution, and to move that the rules be suspended that it may be received and adopted.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That it shall be in order on the 25th day of the present month, at half-past one o'clock, p. m., to report from the Committee on Railways and Canals the bill (H. R. No. 1385) to regulate commerce by railroad among the several States, for consideration as the special order in the House on that day and from day to day thereafter, commencing at the same hour, until disposed of, to the exclusion of all other business except regular appropriation bills.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If this resolution should be adopted, would it be in order to raise any point of order on the bill that would send it to the Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. If the House now orders that this bill shall be considered on a day named "in the House," no point of order could be made against it to send it to the Committee of the Whole. The way the resolution of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] is framed, it will, if adopted, bring the House absolutely to the consideration of the bill on that day and at that hour.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Does it cut off the morning hour?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes, from the phraseology of the resolution, that the gentleman intends that there shall be a morning hour on each day.

Mr. McCRARY. That is my intention.

Mr. PARKER, of Missouri. Will the gentleman say in his resolution "after the morning hour?"

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman should do that he would not get the floor on his bill unless there was a morning hour. Sometimes by business coming over from the day previous there is no morning hour, to the regret of many gentlemen.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The rules were then suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the resolution was adopted.

PASSAGE-WAYS OF THE CAPITOL.

Mr. KILLINGER. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to report the following resolution for consideration at this time:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be requested to cause the various halls and passage-ways of the House end of the Capitol building to be cleared of all obstructions and stalls for the sale of merchandise: Provided, That the telegraph stands shall be provided for in the old Hall of the House of Representatives, in such locations therein as the Speaker may direct.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. RAINEY. I object.

Mr. KILLINGER. I move that the rules be so suspended that the resolution may be adopted.

Tellers were ordered upon seconding the motion to suspend the rules; and Mr. KILLINGER and Mr. RAINEY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 40, noes not counted.

So the motion was not seconded.

PAYMENT OF MAIL-AGENTS, ETC.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I move that the rules be suspended in order that I may introduce and have passed at this time a bill to authorize the settlement of certain accounts in the Post-Office Department.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to mail-agents and route-agents the sum of money that may be justly due them by the Government of the United States for services rendered by them under legal contracts of the Government prior to June 1, 1861, existing law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is this a report of any committee?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. It comes from no committee. I desire one minute to state to the House that there are certain sums of money in the Treasury of the United States due to certain mail-agents and post-route agents. They were due to them at the breaking out of the war in 1861; to many of them they had been due for twelve months previous. By a law of Congress all of these persons who served in the rebel army were deprived of the payment of the amounts due them. But since these people belong to a class whose disabilities have been removed by Congress long since, it seems to me that they should be paid. The officers of the Treasury recommend their payment, and are desirous that they should be paid.

Mr. DAWES. How much will it take from the Treasury?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I do not know how much; $100,000 or $150,000; the money is there.

Mr. DAWES. Is there any settlement of the accounts?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Their accounts have all been made out and audited.

Mr. SPEER. Did the gentleman say that the officers of the Treasury desire their payment?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Some of them do. The last Congress passed a law of this kind in relation to census-takers.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I suggest to the gentleman to change his resolution, so that it shall read 14th of April, instead of June 1, 1861.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I am willing to do that.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I do not see why we should confiscate the property of these men more than the property of anybody else.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for that.

Mr. HALE, of New York. Does the resolution come from any committee?

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. It does not.

The SPEAKER. The bill as modified will be read.

The Clerk read the bill as modified. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to mail-agents and route-agents the sums of money that may be justly due them by the Government of the United States for services rendered by them under legal contracts of the Government previous to April 14, 1861, existing law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. DAWES. I suggested to the gentleman that the bill ought to be confined to audited claims. The bill as it now stands proposes to pay these persons "sums of money that may be justly due them by the Government of the United States, existing law to the contrary notwithstanding." That language will open the claim of every individual who may think that the existing law has not allowed him a just amount. It will open liquidated claims wherever any claimant may think the proper amount has not been allowed. If they are liquidated and stand on the accounts of the Post-Office Department, I agree that they are just like the claims of any other individuals.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I suggest to the gentleman from Georgia to say "existing laws as to loyalty or disloyalty."

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I have no objection to that. That is what I meant.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that he have the bill referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, with leave to report at any time. Nobody will object to that; and then the bill can come here in proper form.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I would like to include in the bill mail-contractors as well as mail-agents.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to modify his bill.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Then I make that modification.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to call attention to one point. At the time referred to I was connected with the Post-Office Department; and I wish to say to the gentleman from Georgia and to the House that some of the cases of these mail-agents, &c., were of such a character that I am unwilling to vote for a general law that will pay them all without discrimination. In some instances there was on the part of those agents an eagerness to rob the United States of its property, and to dispose of it without any respect at all for the authority to which they were subject and which they were bound to obey. Independently of their association with the cause of the South (which is a matter we all understand and which is now past) there was on the part of some of these men conduct in the management of the public property which showed an eagerness to violate their obligations. I speak of this as entirely independent of their subsequent association with the rebellion.

It is for that reason, and not for any political reason, that I am unwilling to support a sweeping act of this kind, which will condone offenses connected very much with the individual character or honesty of many of these agents. I hope therefore that the bill will be referred.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, Congress has long since removed all the disabilities of the class to which these people belong; and as I have already said, a bill precisely similar to this in form was passed by both Houses of the last Congress, to pay all the census-takers in the South for their services in 1860. I ask the passage of this bill now, because I have waited long enough for a report from a committee, and because the question is one of repudiation or the contrary. I want to know who are in favor of repudiating the debts of the Government to these people, all of whom are poor.

Mr. MAYNARD. My impression is that there is law enough to pay these debts, if the money were at hand for the purpose. But the money has been covered into the Treasury by an act passed some time ago. All that is necessary is that we make an appropriation adequate to cover such accounts as may be allowed by the Sixth Auditor.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I ask a vote on my motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair directs that the vote on seconding the motion to suspend the rules be taken by tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. SENER, and the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. YOUNG.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 72, noes 75.

So the motion to suspend the rules was not seconded.

INVESTIGATION OF DISTRICT AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of the following-named members as the select committee for the investigation of District affairs, in pursuance of the resolution of Mr. WILSON, of Indiana: Mr. WILSON of Indiana, Mr. HALE of New York, Mr. HUBBELL of Michigan, Mr. CLYMER of Pennsylvania, and Mr. JEWETT of Ohio.

CENTENNIAL MEDALS.

Mr. HOOPER. The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures have instructed me to report a bill (H. R. No. 1753) to authorize medals commemorating the one hundredth anniversary of the first meeting of the Continental Congress and of the Declaration of Independence. I move that the rules be suspended to pass the bill.

The bill was read. It provides that medals, with appropriate devices, emblems, and inscriptions, be prepared at the Mint of the United States at Philadelphia, to commemorate the one hundredth anniversary of the first meeting of the Continental Congress and of the Declaration of Independence, and that such medals, in any suitable metal or alloy, may, on and after the anniversary they are designed to commemorate, be furnished to applicants therefor, subject to the provisions of the fifty-second section of the coinage act of 1873.

Mr. HOOPER. I trust there will be no objection to this bill. It is one that will involve no expense to the Government.

Mr. DAWES. I ask that the section of the law referred to in the bill be read.

Mr. HOOPER. I send it to the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 52. That dies of a national character may be executed by the engraver, and national and other medals struck by the coiner of the mint at Philadelphia, under such regulations as the superintendent, with the approval of the Director of the Mint, may prescribe: Provided, That such work shall not interfere with the regular coinage operations, and that no private medal dies shall be prepared at said mint, or the machinery or apparatus thereof be used for that purpose.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to inquire of my colleague whether he contemplates the prizes which are to be awarded in the shape of medals are to be so made?

Mr. HOOPER. I will state, in reply to my colleague, that by the regulations of the Mint, when these medals are applied for, the parties are charged the whole cost and 10 per cent. additional.

Mr. DAWES. If so, then if the exposition desires to have these prize medals manufactured at our Mint, they can be manufactured there by paying for them?

Mr. HOOPER. By paying for them with an addition of 10 per cent. to the cost.

Mr. GARFIELD. Does the law require payment by private parties, or is it a mere matter of custom that they are required to pay for them?

Mr. HOOPER. It is subject to the regulation which I will read:

Under such regulation as the superintendent, with the approval of the Director of the Mint, may prescribe.

Mr. DAWES. Suppose, in a burst of patriotism, they should think it best on the whole we should furnish the medals free?

Mr. HOOPER. I think we may trust them to that extent.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I hope the gentleman will add a clause in that regard to his bill.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will add to the end of the bill these words:

Upon receiving the cost thereof.

Mr. GARFIELD. On the payment of not less than the cost thereof.

The SPEAKER. The proposition must be presented as a whole.

Mr. HOOPER. I accept the amendment as a modification of my proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

And such medals, in any suitable metal or alloy, may, on and after the anniversary which they are designed to commemorate, be furnished to applicants therefor, subject to the provisions of the fifty-second section of the coinage act of 1873, on the payment of a sum not less than the cost thereof.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on seconding the motion for a suspension of the rules.

The motion was seconded.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the bill was passed.

METROPOLITAN POLICE.

Mr. COX. I move to put the following on its passage.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Congress by a law passed March 3, 1873, appropriated for salaries and other necessary expenses of the Metropolitan police for the District of Columbia $207,530, and provided a further sum amounting to $103,765 shall be paid to defray the expenses of said Metropolitan police force by the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the county of Washington beyond the limits of said cities in the District of Columbia; and whereas the proper authorities of the District of Columbia were by said law authorized and required to levy a special tax, not exceeding ½ of one per cent. to be specially deposited once in each week as such collections were made, and appropriated and expended for said purpose only, for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and provided further in said law that an annual report of the board of Metropolitan-police commissioners shall be made to the Attorney-General of the United States, who shall also be charged with the disbursement of said appropriations; and whereas it is alleged that the Metropolitan police of the District have not been paid that proportion of their salaries due from the District since the last of May, 1873: Therefore,

Resolved, That the select joint committee this day appointed to investigate District matters be directed to investigate the matters connected with these appropriations and report to this House whether the conditions of said law of March 3, 1873, have been complied with, whether the said local tax has been levied and paid, and whether the Attorney-General or any other officer has ordered or caused to be paid the full salaries of said police, and if not, what reason exists for such non-payment.

Mr. COX. I move to suspend the rules and put that resolution on its passage.

The motion was seconded.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the resolution passed.

NATIONAL FREEDMEN'S SAVINGS-BANK.

Mr. BROMBERG, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire into the management and condition of the National Freedmen's Savings and Trust Company; and whether said company has violated its charter, and to report, by bill or otherwise, such measures as shall best protect the interests of the class for whom said bank was chartered.

AMOS FARLING.

Mr. BURROWS. Before making a motion to suspend the rules I will, by unanimous consent, make a brief statement.

By an act of Congress in 1873, the Secretary of the Interior was authorized to place on the pension-roll the name of Amos Farling. He was designated in the act as a member of Company H, and the Secretary refuses to pay him, owing to a mistake in the name of his company, it being Company C instead of Company H. He has been kept out of his pension owing to that mistake, and my object now is to present a bill making the proper correction. He is in indigent circumstances, and this relief ought to be afforded.

Mr. SPEER. When was the act passed?

Mr. BURROWS. February 5, 1873.

I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to amend an act entitled "An act granting a pension to Amos Farling," approved February 5, 1873.

The bill was read. It amends the act entitled "An act granting a pension to Amos Farling," approved February 5, 1873, so as to read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Amos Farling, late private of Company C, Twenty-seventh Regiment United States Infantry.

The SPEAKER. This bill corrects an error merely. Is there objection to this bill being passed?

Mr. McLEAN. I object.

Mr. BURROWS. Then I move that the rules be suspended and the bill passed.

The motion to suspend the rules was seconded, the rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the bill (H. R. No. 1754) was passed.

JOSEPH C. BRECKENRIDGE.

Mr. BECK, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 50) for the relief of Joseph C. Breckenridge, for services in the Army of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SPECIAL REPORT OF THE BUREAU OF STATISTICS.

Mr. FIELD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed of the special report of Edward Young, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, on the customs-tariff legislation of the United States, with the appendixes, including the tariff acts approved, respectively, May 1, 1872, and June 6, 1872, and a tabular arrangement of the rates of duty paid under said acts and other statutes now in force, five thousand copies; three thousand for the House, one thousand for the Senate, and one thousand bound for the use of, and distribution by, the Treasury Department.

The SPEAKER. The resolution, under the law, goes to the Committee on Printing; and it is so referred.

WASHINGTON BOARD OF HEALTH.

Mr. STORM, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia:

Whereas it is reported, and has come to the knowledge of members of this House that the board of health of Washington, in the discharge of their duty, have frequently found it necessary to remove and destroy private property from infected houses to prevent the spread of contagious diseases; and whereas, after having estimated the value of such goods and given receipts for the same, no funds have been appropriated by the authorities to enable the board to pay for the same, thereby working great injury and injustice to the afflicted: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to investigate the matter, and report to the House whether any action is proper, and, if so, what action is necessary, to enable the board of health to meet its obligations in the premises.

GRANTS TO AGRICULTURAL AND OTHER COLLEGES.

Mr. MONROE. I am unanimously instructed by the Committee on Education and Labor to report the following resolution, and to move that the rules be suspended, and the resolution passed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee of seven members of this House be appointed by the Speaker, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the condition and management of the agricultural and other colleges which have received grants from the United States under the act of July 2, 1862, and the acts in addition thereto; also, to inquire in regard to the investment and security of the funds of these institutions, and whether their management is in accordance with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the conditions of the aforesaid grants.

Mr. BURCHARD. I should like to know why the Committee on Education and Labor cannot perform that duty? Why is it necessary to have a select committee.

Mr. MONROE. Mr. Speaker, as this was a special work, somewhat outside of the ordinary routine work of the Committee on Education and Labor, and as the committee had received many requests for the consideration of this subject, they preferred to recommend to the House that there should be a select committee appointed for the purpose; especially as the committee preferred to avoid all appearance of desiring to assume jurisdiction for themselves in matters of this kind. They preferred to have the House pass upon this matter, and that a committee should be appointed specially for the purpose.

Mr. BURCHARD. If the Committee on Education and Labor cannot perform that duty—although I do not see why they cannot—the Committee on Agriculture certainly can.

I move to amend the gentleman's motion so as to devolve this duty——

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done under a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will accept the amendment. That committee is not a very hard-worked committee, and can discharge the duty as well as any special committee.

Mr. MONROE. I prefer to test the sense of the House on the resolution as reported.

The question being taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules, there were—ayes 32, noes not counted.

So the House refused to second the motion.

FINANCE AND CURRENCY.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I move that the rules be suspended, and the following resolution agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the country in its agricultural, industrial, and commercial interests is greatly embarrassed and depressed on account of its financial condition; and whereas this has occurred under the financial system of the Government of the United States, thereby rendering it the imperative duty of Congress to correct and remedy the evils thus occurring: Therefore,

Resolved, That this House will, on and after Monday, the 9th instant, after the expiration of the morning hour of each day, to the exclusion of all other business except reports from the Committees on Ways and Means and Appropriations, proceed to the consideration of questions of finance, with a view of correcting existing evils and giving relief to the country.

The question was put upon seconding the motion to suspend the rules; and on a division there were—ayes 41, noes 50, no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, and Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, to act as tellers.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I rise to a question of order. I desire to ask, if this resolution should be adopted what question would be before the House on the day indicated?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to answer that question.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. I desire to inquire if the adoption of this resolution would exclude reports from the Committee on Elections.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would, unless they could be considered financial measures.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know whether, if this resolution were adopted, it would exclude all reports from any other committees?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I ask that my resolution be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where the bills on this question are pending.

There was no objection; and it was so ordered.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. DARRALL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. No. 798) to establish certain post-routes; when the Speaker signed the same.

TRANSMISSION OF PRINTED MATTER.

Mr. STOWELL. I am instructed by the Committe on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to move to suspend the rules for the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads be authorized to report House bill No. 825, providing for the free distribution of printed matter, &c., on Thursday, February 12, and that it be made the special order for that day at half-past one o'clock, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of.

Mr. HALE, of Maine. Will not the gentleman make the same exception which has been made by other gentlemen in favor of regular appropriation bills?

Mr. STOWELL. Certainly; I will do that. I will add to the resolution the words, "excepting the regular appropriation bills."

Mr. O'BRIEN. Does this bill provide for the free distribution of newspapers in the county in which they are published?

Mr. STOWELL. It does.

Mr. KILLINGER. And for the free circulation of exchanges?

Mr. STOWELL. Yes, sir.

Tellers were ordered upon seconding Mr. STOWELL'S motion to suspend the rules; and Mr. STOWELL and Mr. KASSON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 111, noes 36.

So the motion was seconded.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. I ask the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Would it be in order to call for the reading of the bill to which the resolution refers?

The SPEAKER. The title of the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to provide for the distribution of public documents printed by authority of Congress, and of seeds furnished by the Agricultural Department, for the free exchange of newspapers between publishers, and for the free transmission of weekly newspapers by mail within the county where published.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 164, nays 66, not voting 58; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Albert, Albright, Arthur, Ashe, Atkins, Averill, Barber, Barrere, Beck, Begole, Bell, Blount, Bradley, Bright, Brown, Buckner, Bundy, Burchard, Burleigh, Burrows, Roderick R. Butler, Cain, Caldwell, Cannon, Amos Clark, jr., Clements, Clymer, Clinton L. Cobb, Stephen A. NAYS—Messrs. Archer, Berry, Bland, Bromberg, Buffinton, Benjamin F. Butler, John B. Smith, Snyder, Starkweather, Stephens, Swann, Taylor, Todd, Tremain, Walls, Wheeler, White, Whitehouse, Ephraim K. Wilson, and Woodford—58.

So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended and the resolution adopted.

The roll-call having been commenced was suspended in consequence of the confusion in the Hall.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I wish to make an inquiry of the Chair. If this bill should pass, would it not give the franking privilege to the publishers of newspapers, while members of Congress would not enjoy that right?

The SPEAKER. The House is supposed to be engaged in a call of the roll, and the Chair cannot properly answer any question. The call has been suspended to enable order to be restored so that the Clerk may hear the responses of members.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. WHITEHEAD. I desire to state that my colleague, General BOWEN, is detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. SPEER. My colleague, Mr. RANDALL, is unavoidably detained to-day in Philadelphia.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT.

Mr. FORT, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and, under the law, referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, instructed to publish a sufficient number of the last report of the Commissioner of Agriculture to furnish each Senator, and each Member of the House, and each Delegate in this Congress, one thousand volumes for distribution among their constituents.

ABOLITION OF THE COMMITTEE ON FREEDMEN'S AFFAIRS.

Mr. RAINEY. I have been instructed unanimously by the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs to report the following resolution and ask that it be referred to the Committee on the Rules:

Resolved, That the Committee on Freedmen's Affairs be abolished, and the bills now before it be referred to such committees as in the opinion of the Speaker properly have cognizance of the subjects to which they relate.

No objection was made; and the resolution was received and referred accordingly.

INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. AVERILL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting to the House the draught of a bill to provide for the establishment of a reservation for the Indians on the Colville agency, in the Territory of Washington, and for the Cœur d'Alene Indians of the Territory of Idaho; which was recommitted, and ordered to be printed.

REDUCTION OF POSTAGE.

Mr. WADDELL, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of William Coventry H. Waddell, on the reduction of international and domestic postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

ORGANIZATION OF THE STATE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. ORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1755) to provide for the more complete organization of the State Department; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MAIL CONTRACTORS.

Mr. SENER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be directed to inquire into the expediency of including in the appropriations for the year ending June 30, 1873, a sum or sums sufficient to cover the amounts properly certified by the Auditor of the Post-Office Department to be due and unpaid to contractors in the late insurrectionary States on account of contracts for carrying the mails in said States prior to the 14th of April, in the year 1861, and coupling with said appropriations a proviso removing all tests of loyalty as a condition of payment.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES.

Mr. MONROE. At the request of quite a number of gentlemen, I offer again the resolution of inquiry in regard to agricultural colleges, modified as suggested by gentlemen on this floor so as to instruct the Committee on Education and Labor, instead of a select committee, to make this inquiry.

The resolution, as modified, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Education and Labor is hereby instructed to inquire into the condition and management of the agricultural and other colleges which have received grants from the United States under the act of July 2, 1862, and the acts in addition thereto; also, to inquire in regard to the investment and security of the funds of those institutions, and whether their management is in accordance with the Constitution and laws of the United States, and the conditions of the aforesaid grants.

No objection being made, the resolution, as modified, was adopted.

GRANT OF LAND TO CHEYENNE.

Mr. CROUNSE. I am instructed by the Committee on the Territories to report for consideration at this time, a bill (H. R. No. 1756) to amend the act entitled "An act to withdraw from settlement and sale a certain section of land in Wyoming Territory," approved May 23, 1872.

The bill, which was read, provides that the first section of the act referred to in the above title be amended to read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 30, in township 14 north, of range 66 west, of the public lands in Laramie County, Wyoming Territory, be, and the same is hereby, withdrawn from settlement and sale under existing laws, and reserved for the use of the city of Cheyenne, in said county, for the purpose of enabling the proper authorities of said city to construct and maintain on said land a reservoir of water for the supply of said city.

Mr. CROUNSE. The Committee on the Territories unanimously recommend the passage of this bill. I think there can be no objection to it.

Mr. DUNNELL. I think this bill should be considered by the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. CROUNSE. A former Congress passed a bill donating a section of land to the city of Cheyenne, for the purpose of erecting a water reservoir thereon. By some mistake the section was located six miles west of the location intended. This bill is to correct that mistake. It has been considered by the Committee on the Territories, and they are unanimously of opinion that it should be passed. I think there can be no objection to it.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask that it may be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. CROUNSE. I move that the rules be suspended, and the bill passed.

The motion was seconded on a division—ayes 83, noes not counted.

The rules were then suspended, (two-thirds voting in the affirmative,) and the bill was passed.

CIVIL-SERVICE EXAMINATIONS.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move to suspend the rules to pass a joint resolution in relation to civil-service examinations. After it is read I hope I may be allowed a moment to explain it.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that in all cases under the civil-service examinations for positions under the Government, when a disabled United States soldier, his wife, or the widow of a deceased soldier dying of wounds or diseases contracted in the line of duty as such soldier, or his orphan child, shall pass such examination at the standard fixed by the said rules, such person shall have precedence for appointment to any existing vacancy, anything in the rules of the civil service to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I desire to say one word. There is an existing provision of law similar to this resolution; but in the case of a disabled soldier who had passed the examination I called the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury to it, and he decided that the civil-service rules repealed that enactment of Congress. I do not think he is right; but I think the passage of this joint resolution will set him right.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course there will be no objection to this measure.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not wish to antagonize the resolution; but had it not better be referred to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and considered by them before it is put on its passage?

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I think we had better pass the resolution now.

Mr. KELLOGG. Our committee will have a meeting this week.

Mr. HOLMAN. The resolution is entirely right.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Certainly. Let it be passed now. We do not need to refer it.

The question being taken on seconding the motion to suspend the rules, it was seconded.

The question recurring on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the joint resolution, (H. R. No. 51,) it was agreed to unanimously.

TARIFF FOR REVENUE.

Mr. NIBLACK. I move to suspend the rules and adopt the following resolution:

Resolved, as the sense of this House, That any scheme for the improvement of the finances of the country will be unsatisfactory and incomplete which does not embrace a revision of the tariff in the interest of revenue and for the emancipation of commerce from all unnecessary restrictions; and that the Committee on Ways and Means be instructed to proceed with such a revision of the tariff.

Mr. KELLOGG. Is not the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] aware that under the 10 per cent. reduction made by the last Congress importations have fallen off very much?

Mr. NIBLACK. I cannot now go into a discussion of the merits of this question. I simply ask the adoption of this resolution as a business proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair directs that the vote on seconding the motion to suspend the rules be taken by tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. NIBLACK, and the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. DAWES.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 92.

So the motion to suspend the rules was not seconded.

DISTRICT COURTS IN IOWA.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the bill (H. R. No. 223) changing the times for holding certain district courts of the United States for the State of Iowa.

Mr. McCRARY. I ask unanimous consent that these amendments be taken up and concurred in at once. They relate simply to changing the times of holding district courts in my own State. There is no contest about the matter.

There being no objection, the following amendments of the Senate were considered and concurred in:

In lines 6 and 7 of the bill strike out the words "third Tuesday," wherever they occur, and insert "fourth Monday."

Mr. McCRARY moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT PAYMENTS FOR RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. I move to suspend the rules, so that it shall be in order to offer in Committee of the Whole the following as an amendment to the Army appropriation bill:

Provided, That the Secretary of War, in the expenditure of any money appropriated by this bill, where the Pacific Railroads or any of their branches—in any case where the Government retains the amount charged for its business on account of advances made to such railroads or either of them—come into competition with any other line of transportation, in deciding which line of transportation is the lowest bidder, shall consider all the money to be paid to the said Pacific Railroads or their branches as so much saved to the Treasury, and govern the transportation of men and supplies accordingly.

Let me say a word in reference to this matter. As to two roads in the State of Kansas, I wish to say that since 1873 it would have saved $40,000 to the Government if men and supplies had been carried over the Kansas Pacific Railroad, instead of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé road. The case is the same with other lines of transportation competing with the Pacific roads in Minnesota and Nebraska.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Would it not be in order to have that amendment translated? I do not think anybody can understand it in its present form.

Mr. SPEER. Is this proposition in the interest of the railroads or of the Government?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. It is in the interest of the Government. I have no interest in any railroad. But it must be obvious that if the supplies of the Government sent from Fort Leavenworth to the posts of New Mexico could be transported over the Kansas Pacific Railroad, instead of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé road, it would be a saving of so much to the Government, as the Kansas Pacific road owes the Government over $1,000,000.

Mr. SPEER. The question was put in good faith for the information of myself and others.

Mr. COX. I ask that the proposition be again read.

The proposition was again reported.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I insist that nobody knows what that means.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Would it not be in order as an amendment to the appropriation bill without a suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks whether this would not be in order without a suspension of the rules.

Mr. G. F. HOAR. Yes, sir; it being a limitation on the appropriation reported in that particular bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would answer that question by putting another. Is not the power already in the Secretary of War?

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. May I be permitted to make an explanation?

Mr. ELDREDGE. Yes; I hope the gentleman will make an explanation, so somebody will understand his proposition.

Mr. COBB, of Kansas. Yes, and I think I can, to the satisfaction and even the understanding of the gentleman from Wisconsin, and if I can, I shall evidently accomplish considerable. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I have no interest in any railroad in making this motion, and have no interest in anything which concerns the matter, except the interest of the Government. I state that to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SPEER,] who asked the question in good faith, as he says. From correspondence with the Secretary of War I learn this fact: During the past year the country has paid out to the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railroad, for the transportation of men and supplies from Fort Leavenworth to the posts of the Army in the Southwest, principally in New Mexico, the sum of $4,984.71 for men, and $34,189 for supplies, when the same work might have been done by the Kansas Pacific Railroad equally as well. This is from the 1st day of January, 1873, down to October 1, 1873. The Kansas Pacific Railroad is indebted to the United States upward of $1,000,000, and not one dollar would have been necessary to have been taken from the Treasury had this road been employed. I bring forward this case only for illustration, and for its facts, which are within my knowledge.

Now I ask to have the privilege of moving that amendment, not only as applicable to the Kansas Pacific road, but as applicable to all the Pacific roads and their branches to which the Government has made these advances and which the Government receives back in no respect except in the transportation of men and supplies for the Army and Navy and the mail. And if I can have the privilege of moving the amendment, Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly satisfied it will be a saving to the Government, and in the interest of no corporation—a saving to the extent, I believe, of $100,000 for the next fiscal year. I only ask it in that interest and none other.

Mr. ELDREDGE. If the gentleman can save that much I withdraw my objection to the offering of his proposition to the Army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on seconding the motion for a suspension of the rules.

The motion was seconded.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the proposition was declared to be in order to the Army appropriation bill.

CHEAP TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. BLOUNT, by unanimous consent, presented resolutions adopted by the Cheap Transportation Association in convention at Washington City, January 14, 1874; which were referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

COMMERCIAL CONVENTION.

Mr. BLOUNT also, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of the commercial convention held at Atlanta, Georgia, May 20, 1873, to the Congress of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, and ordered to be printed.

PATENT RIGHTS.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1757) to prevent extortion in the use of patent rights and to amend the law in relation thereto; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

INDIAN RESERVATION, IDAHO TERRITORY.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs a bill (H. R. No. 1758) authorizing the purchase of six hundred and forty acres of land for an Indian reservation in the Territory of Idaho; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed and recommitted.

MILITARY BOUNTY LAND DISTRICTS.

Mr. COMINGO obtained the floor.

Mr. MILLS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a resolution:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill to the House revising the tariff and reducing the rates on iron and steel.

The SPEAKER. That proposition would divide the House, and the gentleman from Missouri is entitled to the floor.

Mr. COMINGO. I ask the Clerk to read my resolution, in reference to which I move a suspension of the rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Department of the Interior be required to furnish this House with the names of soldiers and others to whom patents were issued for land lying in the military-bounty land districts in the States of Missouri and Arkansas for service in the war of 1812, the number of the warrant, the description of the land granted to each, with the date of the patent, place of residence of each soldier, company and regiment in which they severally served, and to whom the patent was delivered, and the date when each patent was delivered.

Mr. MAYNARD. That will be a voluminous and costly affair, and I hope some reason will be assigned for it.

And then, on motion of Mr. GARFIELD, (at ten minutes past four o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

He also presented the petition of Fleming Crump and William Williamson, two survivors of what was called the Yellowstone expedition in 1824, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the petition of Peter Reitz and William S. Babcock, asking compensation for heroic acts in saving Government property; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition and papers of Mrs. Flavillia Knight, of Louisa County, Iowa, late widow of F. F. Dayton, who was a private in Company F, Eleventh Regiment Indiana Infantry Volunteers, asking for additional pension for herself and minor children; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WINDOM presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the passage of an act granting a pension to H. A. Huntress from the 14th day of March, 1864, to the 27th day of March, 1871; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I present the petition of a committee representing some 11,000 colored citizens of the city of Atlanta and State of Georgia. I ask that it be read; it is very short.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will be read if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

ATLANTA, GEORGIA, January 26, 1874.

Whereas Hon. A. H. STEPHENS, in his speech before Congress January 5, 1874, said that colored people of the State of Georgia did not desire the passage of the civil-rights bill; and whereas the Georgia Legislature has also adopted resolutions informing the Congress of the United States that the colored people of Georgia do not desire the passage of said civil-rights bill; and whereas the allegations of Mr. STEPHENS and the Georgia Legislature are without foundation in fact: Therefore,

Resolved, That we, a portion of the colored citizens of Georgia, do most solemnly deny both the speech of A. H. STEPHENS and said resolutions of the Georgia Legislature, so far as they relate to the colored citizens of this State being adverse to the passage of said civil-rights bill.

Resolved, That some arrangement be made by this meeting to deny the fact of the said assertions of Mr. STEPHENS and the Georgia Legislature.

Resolved, That we, the citizens of the city of Atlanta, Georgia, immediately formin the Congress of the United States that we desire a speedy passage of the civil-rights bill, and that we claim it as a right they owe us, as members of the republican party, and more particularly as citizens of the United States.

Resolved, That we most heartily congratulate and thank Mr. ELLIOTT for his able and pointed speech, January 6, 1874, in the House of Representatives of the United States, in behalf of the passage of the civil-rights bill, and in vindicating the ability and patriotism of the colored citizens of the country.

J. B. FULLER,
Chairman.
J. O. WIMBISH,
W. D. MOORE,
Secretaries.

Therefore, we, a committee appointed at a mass-meeting of the colored citizens of the city of Atlanta, Georgia, held on the 26th day of January, 1874, with power to forward the above expression of 11,000 of the colored citizens of this city, do make this petition:

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives:

We, the undersigned committee, do hereby respectfully petition your honorable bodies to speedily pass the civil-rights bill, now under consideration in Congress, as the earnest request of the above-stated citizens, with the further request that your honorable bodies will, in view of the unjust manner in which we are now treated by the Legislature and judicial tribunals in this State, enact such laws as, in your wisdom, are necessary to secure each citizen in the United States, without regard to race, color, or previous condition of servitude, equal civil and political rights, privileges, and immunities before the law.

And we your petitioners will ever pray.

H. E. BAULDIN,
ROMULUS MOORE,
C. WIMBISH,
C. H. MORGAN,
JAS. A. TATE,
Committee.

Mr. FLANAGAN. I ask that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ANTHONY. I did not listen attentively to the reading of that petition, but I thought it referred to proceedings in the other House. If so, I do not know whether we ought to entertain it.

Mr. FLANAGAN. No, sir; it merely speaks of a speech delivered by an honorable member of that House.

Mr. ANTHONY. I did not listen to it very attentively, but I thought it referred to speeches and proceedings in the other House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It refers to a speech of one member of the House, and proceedings of the Legislature of the State of Georgia, and upon them bases a petition that Congress will pass the civil-rights bill.

Mr. FLANAGAN. That is all.

Mr. NORWOOD. I did not understand the Senator from Texas to state from whom this petition comes.

Mr. FLANAGAN. It comes from a committee.

Mr. NORWOOD. Of what?

Mr. FLANAGAN. The names of the committee have been read; I do not recollect them. The letter to me inclosing the petition is from a gentleman there who has once represented the State in the Legislature, by the name of Romulus Moore, a good old Roman, judging by his name. [Laughter.] I take occasion now, having the floor, although I did not intend to have made a remark, to say that this petition meets my approbation to the very fullest extent; and whenever that question comes up for action I shall be found, as I have heretofore uniformly been found, advocating that policy; and will then take occasion to submit some remarks to the Senate upon the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

, Mr. SCOTT presented the memorial of manufacturers, wholesale dealers, and retailers of hats, of the city of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; the memorial of manufacturers, wholesale dealers, and retailers of hats, of the city of Allentown, Pennsylvania; the memorial of journeymen hatters, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania; and a letter of manufacturers, jobbers, and retailers of hats, of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the extension of the Wells patent for forming hat-bodies; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. LOGAN presented resolutions of the State Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic of the State of Illinois, asking an equalization of bounties to soldiers and sailors of the late war; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WEST presented the petition of Mrs. Zepherin Lambert, of Washington Parish, Louisiana, praying to be reimbursed for nineteen bales of cotton taken from her by the Government of the United States, as appears by the certificate of the proper officer, on the 29th of April, 1833; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Charles Clinton, formerly assistant treasurer of the United States at New Orleans, for reimbursement of the sum of $5,850 stolen from his office; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CONKLING. I have a petition which seems to represent all of the marine insurance companies represented in New York, and many importers and citizens of high respectability of the State of New York, touching the Hydrographic Office in the Navy Department of the United States. The petition sets forth that the work of this office is of great value to commerce; that it is one of the modes chiefly relied on to ascertain the location of shoals and dangerous places at sea; that other nations have a like establishment, and that they distribute to the nations in general information thus gained, and the memorialists suggest that it behooves the United States to do its part in contributing to the safety of the world. The petition prays that the work may be nourished and strengthened by adequate appropriations. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a petition praying for the passage of the civil-rights bill. This petition is printed and the signatures to the petition are printed, but it is accompanied by a letter from a gentleman who purports to be secretary of a committee in favor of the object of the petition, requesting me to present it. I therefore feel bound to present it, although it is not written. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I present concurrent resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, asking for the passage of the bill in reference to the title to what are known as the Osage ceded lands; and I ask their reference to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That Osage land question was before two committees; and this paper either ought to be sent to the Committee on the Judiciary, or that committee ought to have recalled from it two bills that I believe we have on the same subject. I do not know how the matter has got mixed up.

Mr. INGALLS. I know nothing about that. The memorial or concurrent resolution of the Legislature that I have submitted was forwarded to me by mail, with the request that it might be introduced and referred. If the bills previously introduced are before the Judiciary Committee, I would suggest the reference of this to the same committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am sure one is before the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The papers will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONOVER presented a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Florida, asking for the establishment of certain mail-routes; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Florida, asking for an appropriation to deepen the ship-channel in Apalachicola Bay; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. THURMAN. I hold in my hand a copy of the preamble and resolutions of the common council of the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, in reference to the new public building for that city. This is not in the form of a memorial to Congress, but I believe it has been the practice to lay such papers before the Senate and have them referred. I move that this paper be received and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STOCKTON presented the petition of William Kilburn, praying for the passage of a law authorizing his restoration to the Navy as an ensign, at the foot of that class of which he was a member at the time of his resignation; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut, presented two memorials of the wholesale hat dealers of South Norwalk and Brookfield, Connecticut, remonstrating against the further extension of the patent granted to Henry A. Wells, April 25, 1846, for improvements in machinery for making hat-bodies; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented the memorial of workingmen of Duncannon, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against a restoration of the tax on tea and coffee, and also against the reduction of the tariff duties of 10 per cent. made by the last Congress on certain productions of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SCHURZ. I present a remonstrance against the further extension of Henry A. Wells's patent of April 25, 1846, reissued in 1860, 1862, and 1865, and extended by the Commissioner of Patents, and by an act of Congress approved March 4, 1867, extended for a further term of seven years, the letters-patent to said Wells being for improvements in machinery for making hat-bodies. This remonstrance is signed by the manufacturers, wholesale dealers, and retailers, of the city of Saint Louis, Missouri. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORTON. I present a memorial of the same character, signed by hatters of the city of Indianapolis, Indiana, remonstrating against the extension of Wells's patent for forming hat-bodies. I move its reference to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to present the memorial of hatters of Syracuse, New York, remonstrating against the extension of letters-patent in the case of Henry A. The motion was agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRATT. I hold in my hand several remonstrances of the same character from hat manufacturers of different cities in the State of Indiana, against any further extension of the patent originally granted to Henry A. Wells, April 25, 1846, and already once extended by act of Congress. They say that this is a monopoly of twenty-eight years' standing, and costs every man who wears a hat twenty-five cents in addition to what he would otherwise have to pay. I move the reference of these remonstrances to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I have several remonstrances of the same kind from hatters of Michigan, in which they state that this monopoly yields $2,500,000 a year to the owner of this patent, which has already been in existence for twenty-eight years. I move the reference of these remonstrances to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I have a petition from wholesale hatters of New York, which says all that the memorials just presented by my friend from Michigan say, and objects entirely to the second extension of these letters-patent. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCREERY presented a memorial of manufacturers, dealers, and retailers of hats of the city of Louisville, Kentucky, remonstrating against the extension of the Wells patent for forming hat-bodies; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

TELEGRAPH OPERATOR.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I offer the following resolution:

Ordered, That the Presiding Officer of the Senate be authorized to appoint the operator for the Senate wing of the Capitol provided for in the act "in relation to the lines of telegraph connecting the Capitol with the various Departments of the Government."

This resolution was handed to me to be introduced. It has not been considered by a committee, but it seems proper in order to carry out the existing law and enable us to take advantage of the telegraph that has already been established. I therefore ask for its present adoption.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

IMPROVEMENTS AT MOUTH OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. WEST. I move that the Senate now take up the bill (S. No. 87) to facilitate the execution of, and to protect, certain public works of improvement at the mouth of the Mississippi River.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish the Senator would not ask us to take up that bill this morning. I have glanced over it very hurriedly as it comes back from the committee, and my impression is that it is not what it ought to be, and not what the Senate will make it if it is debated. I should like a little time to look at it. I am as much in favor of the object of the bill, the protection of the public works and of navigation at the mouth of the Mississippi, as the Senator himself or anybody can be; but I should like to have the bill somewhat more perfect than I think it is, with due deference to the Committee on Commerce, even as now reported. I will not object to the Senator calling it up to-morrow morning in the morning hour, but I wish he would let it lie on the table for to-day.

Mr. WEST. I scarcely can decline to yield to the request of the Senator from Ohio, but I beg to ask him that by to-morrow morning, if the bill does not suit him, he will have something prepared that will meet his views, so that we can have some remedy suggested in place of merely objections. With that view I will let it go over till to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

MAIL-BID DEPOSITS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask leave to make a report at this time. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 417) relating to certain deposits in the Post-Office Department, to report it back with an amendment in the nature of a substitute. This bill was introduced yesterday by the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT,] and he desired its immediate consideration. I should, therefore, like to have it acted upon now.

There being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Finance was to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That whenever any person who has made, or who may hereafter make, a bid for carrying the mails of the United States shall so request in writing, it shall be the duty of the Postmaster-General to transfer and deposit the check or draft that may have been received with such bid with the Treasurer of the United States, who shall collect the same and hold the proceeds to be repaid by the Treasurer to such bidder upon the certificate of the Postmaster-General that such bidder is lawfully entitled thereto.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I suggest that the word "to" should be inserted after the word "transfer," so as to read, "transfer to and deposit with," &c.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that ought to be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. SARGENT. I simply wish to state that the substitute meets my views. The original bill I wrote at my desk, and on consultation with some Senators; but I am perfectly satisfied with the substitute, and think it will answer the purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the bill be read again.

The Chief Clerk read the bill as amended.

Mr. RAMSEY. I should like to inquire of the Senator from California whether that provision is sufficient to enable a party to get the money out of the Treasury after it is covered in, without some legislation here again?

Mr. SARGENT. O, yes.

Mr. RAMSEY. Do you think that language is sufficient?

Mr. SARGENT. I think so.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. THURMAN. Before the question is put on the passage of this bill I wish to be informed whether I am right in my apprehension of the law as it now stands. The law now requires a bidder to make a certain deposit of a bank-draft.

Mr. SARGENT. A certified check, to remain, perhaps, for six months in the possession of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. THURMAN. The law, then, requires that specific thing, does it—a certified bank-check?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir; by section 253 of the postal code, which I have before me. I will hand it to the Senator.

Mr. THURMAN. "A certified check or draft, payable to the order of the Postmaster-General, upon some solvent national bank." The reason given for changing this is that these national banks are not solvent, or that there is some danger of their solvency; that there is some danger that this solvent national bank, for it must be one, will not be solvent six months hence. That is not a very great compliment to the national-bank system, that a man bidding for a contract cannot find a national bank that he will trust for six months. It strikes me as a very singular proposition to make to the country or to send out to the country, that when a man has a choice among the two thousand national banks of the country whose checks he will take, what bank he will get to certify a check for him upon his deposit of money with it, in the whole two thousand banks he cannot find one that he will trust for six months.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. May I remind the Senator from Ohio that in California there are no national banks, and therefore they have to make a selection of them rather blindly?

Mr. THURMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon; there are national banks in the State of California, and they pay gold, too.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. They are gold banks.

Mr. THURMAN. They are national banks, and they pay gold; and I suppose one of their checks would be perfectly good.

But, sir, I believe I can vote for this bill for another reason. After this intimation, which I do not quite believe, that the national banks are such shaky institutions, although I am not particularly friendly to them, after looking at this statute I very much doubt whether, in morals at least, the United States would not bear the loss in case the banks should fail.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the Senator permit me to make another suggestion? It may not be a question entirely relating to the solvency of national banks, but it may be a question whether it is not preferable, as a matter of public policy, that the Treasury of the United States should have the benefit of this deposit rather than the national banks.

Mr. THURMAN. If we are going to borrow money to carry on the Government—and some people seem to think that will be necessary; if we are so hard run that we shall have to go shinning around for currency to carry on the Government—I do not know but that this little bill might be of some advantage.

Mr. SHERMAN. My colleague finds a kind of mare's nest in this little bill. Now, all that this bill does is to allow any citizen of the United States who chooses to make a bid to carry the mail-bags of the United States to deposit his money in the Treasury of the United States rather than in a national bank. There may be some people in the United States who believe that everybody is going to fail within six months, or within two months, or within ten days. There may be some people so foolish that they do not like to risk a national bank or anything else—scarcely the Treasury of the United States. They complain that they have to deposit their money with a national bank for six months and take the risk. This bill relieves them from that and allows the money to be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, where it remains safely to their credit. That is all there is in the bill. I do not consider it a matter of very large moment; but I do not think that there is any imputation in this bill that the national banks are not perfectly safe. My colleague, I know, deposits his money in national banks with confidence, and I suppose most of the people of the United States do so. This bill is merely to favor that class of bidders who are remote and who have no opportunity to deposit their money in banks, or on the whole would prefer, as the deposit has to be made in some shape, that it be placed in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. THURMAN. I beg to remind my colleague that it is not I who found the mare's nest, but it is those who promote this bill who found it; who asserted that among two thousand national banks they could not discover one whose certified check they were willing to hold for six months, and therefore they want the Government to hold the money.

I have no objections to that, as I said, both for the reason that I doubt extremely whether the Government of the United States would not be liable under the provisions of the statute if the bank should fail, since it requires that a certified check shall be deposited instead of anything else, and for the reason suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I have not said that the national banks are in this shaky condition; but the statement that they were, or might be, or were supposed to be, and that that created a necessity for legislation by Congress, struck me as a very singular thing to promulgate to this country.

Mr. SARGENT. The difference between the present legislation and the former is, that formerly bonds were allowed to be given by persons who made bids. It was thought that this encouraged straw bids. Therefore the Government required instead of bonds a deposit. The parties are willing to make the deposit; but it is the duty of the Government to make them as safe as possible in doing so. It must be admitted by every one that however strong as a system the national banks are, there may be individual banks that possibly might be selected by this or that bidder which might be weak; at any rate we can make it safer for them, and they feel some alarm, in view of the large amounts of money they are required to deposit, at its remaining in the hands of banks whose affairs they have no opportunity of investigating, and therefore they ask this relief.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 1753) to authorize medals commemorating the one hundredth anniversary of the first meeting of the Continental Congress and of the Declaration of Independence;

A bill (H. R. No. 1754) to amend the act entitled "An act granting a pension to Amos Farling," approved February 5, 1873;

A bill (H. R. No. 1756) to amend the act entitled "An act to withdraw from settlement and sale a certain section of land in Wyoming Territory," approved May 23, 1872; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) in relation to civil-service examinations.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 223) changing the times for holding certain district courts of the United States for the State of Iowa.

MARCUS OTTERBOURG.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first bill on the Calendar is the bill (S. No. 169) for the relief of Marcus Otterbourg, late consul of the United States at the city of Mexico, and minister to the republic of Mexico.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of this bill.

Mr. SUMNER. I observe that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SCHURZ] is out of his seat.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Massachusetts objects, the bill will be laid aside.

Mr. SUMNER. I suggest that it be passed over until the Senator from Missouri comes in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

EDWARD JARVIS.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 302) for the relief of Dr. Edward Jarvis.

Mr. SHERMAN. Objection was made to that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

Mr. SUMNER. Why not act on the case of Dr. Jarvis now? The Senate voted the other day in favor of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection if the vote can be had; but there were objections to this bill which struck me as forcible.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senate is proceeding on that ground I have nothing to say.

Mr. SHERMAN. I certainly cannot vote for the bill, and therefore I think I had better object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio objects, and the bill will be passed over.

WILLIAM H. VESEY.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 69) for the relief of William H. Vesey; which is a direction to the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to William H. Vesey, former consul of the United States at Havre, in France, $1,320.57, being the amount of his loss in consequence of the failure, on March 27, 1857, of the house of Greene & Co., American bankers, with whom he had deposited moneys belonging to the United States to the amount of $1,467.30, upon the assignment by him to the United States of his claims against that firm for the moneys so deposited.

Mr. CONKLING. Let us hear the report in that case.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. PRATT on the 14th of January, from the Committee on Claims:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of William H. Vesey, praying to be relieved of a certain loss sustained while consul at Havre, France, submit the following report:

Mr. Vesey presents the following state of facts as the basis for the relief asked:

On the 27th of March, 1857, he was consul of the United States at Havre, and had been for several years previously. During all this time he had been in the habit of depositing moneys received by him in his official capacity with the banking-house of Greene & Co., American bankers at Paris, with a branch at Havre, for safe-keeping. On that day there remained on deposit in the hands of said firm the sum of $1,467.30, at the time they failed and became insolvent. On settlement of their affairs Mr. Vesey has received 10 per cent. of his deposit, or $146.73, leaving a loss of $1,320.57. Notwithstanding the failure, Mr. Vesey paid the amount of his deposit into the Treasury of the United States.

He asks Congress to refund him the sum of $1,320.57, and says he has executed an assignment to the United States of all his right, title, interest, and claim to the moneys still due from Greene & Co.

The present minister to France recommends the relief of Mr. Vesey.

The Secretary of the Treasury makes no recommendation, but admits that Mr. Vesey has paid the amount of the loss into the Treasury.

The chief clerk in the State Department pays a high compliment to Mr. Vesey as a faithful officer, and says that full confidence may be placed in his statements.

The Secretary of State expresses his confidence in Mr. Vesey's account of his loss, and says this gentleman was for many years in the employ of the Government under his Department in several consulates, and enjoyed a high reputation for integrity, capacity, and the faithful discharge of all the duties of his position.

That the money was lost by the failure of the bankers; that it was funds belonging to the United States, though standing to the credit of Mr. Vesey; that it has been made good to the United States, are facts which the committee assume as established. The evidence is not before us showing the standing and reputed solvency of Greene & Co. at the time of failure, though from the report made to this body on May 23, 1860, by the Committee on Foreign Relations, it would seem there was satisfactory evidence before them that up to the date of their suspending payment the credit of Greene & Co. was good, and their branch house at Havre regarded a safe place for the deposit of moneys, better, much, than the keeping of them by Mr. Vesey either at the consulate or at his residence. Such is the testimony of Mr. Mason, at that time minister from this country to France.

We think the evidence shows that the consul was not guilty of want of caution in making his deposits with this banking-house, if he chose to commit public funds to the hands of others at all for safe-keeping.

The deposit, however, was at his risk. He was bound to account for all the consular fees collected, and he confessed his liability at law by promptly accounting for the money.

Shall he or the Government be the loser? The committee are of opinion that Mr. Vesey should be relieved, and accordingly report a bill herewith, and recommend its passage.

Mr. HOWE. I understand that report comes from the Committee on Claims. Is that the fact?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HOWE. I rise to inquire of the committee what the evidence was that the consul, Vesey, had ever paid into the Treasury that whole sum which was in the hands of the bankers at the time of the failure?

Mr. PRATT. In answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Wisconsin I would state, that this case was before the Committee on Claims of the Forty-second Congress, and a bill similar to the present one—indeed identical with it, I believe—was reported from that committee. The original evidence in the case was not all before the committee at the time of passing upon this case. We relied very much upon the evidence which was collected by the Committee on Foreign Relations. The Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] from that committee, according to the paper which I hold in my hand, made a report in favor of this claim on the 23d of May, 1860; and in that report is set out the original evidence; and some of that evidence is of a very forcible character. I find among the exhibits attached to that report the certificate of Greene & Co., the bankers themselves—

That the account on our books of W. H. Vesey, esq., American consul at Havre, showed a balance in his favor of 7,628.20 francs on the 27th of March, 1857, which sum was then due to him.

The testimony of Mr. Mason, who was at that time our minister to France, is very strong in relation to the merits of this claim. I will read one or two passages from his letter, dated Paris, January 19, 1857:

I certify that since I have been in Paris I employed Messrs. Greene & Co. as my bankers until they suspended business in the month of March last. That up to the date of their suspension the house had my entire confidence, and the very large number of depositors with them shows that the confidence was general.

I further certify that Mr. W. H. Vesey, the consul of the United States at Havre, has often conversed with me on the subject of his safe-keeping of the public money in his hands in the interval between its receipt and disbursement or remittance. In the absence of instructions from the Government, and as the provision made by law for the safe-keeping of the public money—made by the independent treasury act—does not extend to foreign countries, Mr. Vesey's depositing such moneys with bankers appeared to me to be judicious, and far more secure than to endeavor to keep them in his own custody in a sea-port town like Havre, where both at his consulate and lodgings they would have been greatly exposed.

His banking with the branch house of Messrs. Greene & Co., at Havre, met my entire approval, and I more than once expressed to him the opinion that, without some other means of security being furnished by the Government, that course seemed to me best for the public interests.

It seems that, under instruction from the Treasury Department, Mr. Vesey was in the habit, at the end of every quarter, of sending the moneys which had accumulated in his consular office to the house of Baring Brothers & Co., bankers in London. This was money which had accumulated in the interval between making these quarterly returns.

There is abundant evidence on file going to show that American residents in Paris, American merchants there, and travelers, were in the habit of depositing their moneys with this branch house of Greene & Co., at Havre, a house which was of some forty years' standing, and in general good repute.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator will understand that I make no point against the fidelity of this consul. I am inquiring about an independent fact, a very distinct fact. The question I put was what the evidence was before the committee that the consul had in fact paid over the whole of this money to the Treasury. I will ask now another question, as the evidence on that point does not seem to be available. It is this: Was the office of consul at Havre at that time a salaried office, or was it paid by fees?

Mr. PRATT. I am not able to answer the question of the Senator whether he was salaried or whether he was paid by fees.

Mr. HOWE. I am told by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] that it was a salaried office. Was there any evidence before the committee, I would inquire then, showing that it was the usage of the consul to remit all the fees received by him to London, or to deduct from the fees received by him his compensation, whatever it was?

Mr. PRATT. I do not think there was any evidence on that question.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator will allow me to suggest on that point, if these were moneys received in the discharge of his official duties, and as fees payable to the consul, and he was authorized to reserve from these collections the amount of his compensation, would it not follow that these were moneys belonging to himself and to the Government; that only the excess of money over and above his compensation in fact belonged to the Government; that the balance was his?

Mr. PRATT. Probably that would be the inference, that after retaining his salary or compensation from his fees he remitted the balance. I do not remember that there was any evidence upon that question before the committee. I have before me, as I stated before, the report made by the Committee on Foreign Relations in 1860, and that committee wind up as follows:

Under these circumstances, and upon the evidence quoted, the committee are of opinion that the memorialist has exercised a reasonable degree of vigilance and care in providing for the safety of the public moneys which came into his hands, and that the loss which has been sustained is attributable to no neglect upon his part, but to an accident to which the most prudent persons are liable.

I ought to say in this connection that all the evidence goes to show that Mr. Vesey has been in the consular service of the Government for a great many years, and has been a very faithful and efficient officer. I read now a single extract from a letter of Mr. Cass, who was at that time Secretary of State, dated May 14, 1859, upon the occasion of his accepting the resignation of Mr. Vesey:

In accepting your resignation I am directed by the President to assure you that the satisfactory manner in which you have discharged the official duties during the last sixteen years of the consulates at Lisbon, Antwerp, and Havre has justly merited and received the commendation of the Government of the United States.

I believe he is still in the consular service.

Mr. SUMNER. At Nice.

Mr. PRATT. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Will my friend allow me to make an inquiry? I believe that this claim is now seventeen years old. I should like to inquire, first, how it comes that it was never favorably reported from the Committee on Claims before; and, in the same connection, I would ask whether it has been adversely reported by that committee.

Mr. PRATT. I do not know anything about the history of the claim between the year 1860 and the year 1871 or 1872, when it first appeared before the Committee on Claims. I do not think it was ever referred to that committee before the Forty-second Congress.

Mr. SUMNER. Always before to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PRATT. Before that it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the Senator from Massachusetts can probably give the Senate more information on this claim than I am able to do; but during the ten years between 1860 and 1870 I do not think the claim was ever before Congress; at least I have no knowledge of it myself.

Mr. SCOTT. The Senator from Indiana has stated very fully the merits of this case, which turns upon the two questions which have been raised here, the character of the funds and the good faith of the consul; and I will suggest to him, having charge of the bill, that a bill for the relief of this Mr. Vesey has passed the House of Representatives, and has been messaged over to us and referred to the Committee on Commerce. I have in my hand that bill, which is House bill No. 1400, and it would be better, to save further trouble and circumlocution, to move to proceed to the consideration of that bill and substitute it for the Senate bill, so that it may be finally disposed of.

Mr. PRATT. Very well; I accept that suggestion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the House bill on this same subject.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1400) for the relief of William H. Vesey. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to William H. Vesey, former consul of the United States at Havre, in France, the sum of $1,320.57, being the amount of his loss in consequence of the failure, on March 27, 1857, of the house of Greene & Co., American bankers, with whom he had deposited moneys belonging to the United States to the amount of $1,467.30, upon the assignment by him to the United States of his claim against the firm for the moneys so deposited.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. CONKLING. Upon the passage of this bill I shall ask for the yeas and nays, as I should like to record myself against it; other Senators perhaps would like to do the same thing; and I will state in a moment my reasons for voting against it. This claim is seventeen years old, a fact which in itself does not answer it. We are unable to plead the statute of limitations, and therefore, although if this were a claim against anybody except the Government it would be completely answered in law, it is still here for us. The circumstance of the lapse of time, however, is an element I think to be considered in respect of the doubts which seem to me to hang about this transaction. If this was a salaried officer, authorized to withhold from moneys in his hands so much as would make good his salary, then there is nothing to show that these funds were not his and the Government's jointly in equity; nor is there anything to show they were not, upon an accounting, wholly his moneys.

Mr. HOWE. If the Senator will allow me, it was suggested to me when I put that question a short time ago that the office was then a salaried office. It has since been suggested that it was an office compensated by fees.

Mr. CONKLING. That would make it still worse.

Mr. HOWE. That would make it still worse, unquestionably; because the fees would undoubtedly belong to the consul out of which he might be required to account for a certain portion to the United States. I do not know how the law was.

Mr. CONKLING. I assume, from the suggestion made, the hypothesis most favorable to the claimant. If he was an officer compensated wholly by fees, then the suggestion I make is much stronger than it would be in the other case. In that event I think I may say that nothing has been read to us to show that these were not, at least in part, the moneys of the consul. I think there is nothing to show that they were not wholly the moneys of the consul. Therefore I feel at liberty to conclude, upon this state of the case, that if this demand was good and unquestioned in 1857 and 1858 and 1859, while the authorities were in power who had commissioned this man and knew him and had personal knowledge of the facts, and if it has been good ever since, it is rather extraordinary that we should see an effort made now, simultaneously it seems in both Houses, to carry this bill. I do not feel warranted in making any suggestion which would partake of the nature of an imputation upon this man—far from it. I do not know him; but I think I do know that which justifies me in refusing at this time to vote this money from the Treasury upon a demand which, upon the case stated, is doubtful, and which for seventeen years has gone unrecognized.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, the delay of seventeen years is easily explained. I have no personal familiarity with the condition of this case, not having even read the papers; but I remember it of old, years ago, as the report shows in 1860, and the Senator from New York remembers well the organization of the Senate at that time. I had the honor of being a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and the chairman at that time referred this case to me for examination. I drew up a report, which was unanimously accepted by the committee at a moment when a report from me would not have been accepted by that committee unless it was on the firmest foundations. I have not looked at the facts since then; but I remember perfectly well the confidence of my conclusions. I did not doubt that the money was justly due, and so reported to the Senate. There was no opportunity of acting upon it at that time; and we all remember the terrible shadow of war that came over the country and necessarily interrupted the ordinary course of business. This claimant was a patriot, devoted to the cause of the Union, and while we were in peril he forbore his claim, and he forbore it for some time after, while the work of reorganization was going on. It was only when other persons were presenting claims, and when, happily, peace seemed to be assured, that his case found its place once more in this Chamber.

Now, I am not able to go into any precise statement of the facts; I did not expect the claim to come up to-day; nor, indeed, have I had any acquaintance with it of late years. I acted upon it originally officially in my character as a Senator and as a member of the committee which made the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill, upon which the Senator from New York demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. I hope the vote will not be taken this morning. The morning hour has in fact expired. I want to see what was the state of the law when this happened.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of unfinished business, which is House bill No. 792.

REPORTING OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I should like to appeal to the Senator from Vermont, who has that bill in charge, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] to allow me to take from the table a resolution which was laid over yesterday on the suggestion that the Senator from Rhode Island was not in his seat, to authorize the Committee on Printing to make a contract for the reporting of the debates, which will take but a moment. If it occupies any time I will withdraw the request.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will yield, subject to a call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks that the pending order be laid aside informally, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution indicated by him. The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be directed to contract, on behalf of the Senate, with a suitable person to report, for publication in the official record provided for the purpose, the debates and proceedings of the Senate during the sessions of the Forty-third Congress, on the terms allowed by the act entitled "An act making appropriations to pay for reporting the debates and proceedings of Congress," approved January 28, 1874.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I do not know but that the word "authorized" would be better than "directed."

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Say "authorized and directed."

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution as modified.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Maine whether that resolution requires the committee to contract, or whether it simply gives it authority to do so.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It has been so amended as to "authorize and direct" the committee. It is in conformity with an act which we passed a few days ago.

Mr. SAULSBURY. In that form it seems to me to be somewhat objectionable. We might possibly have propositions that would be more advantageous to the Government than to continue the publication of the debates in the RECORD. It may be that some proposition might be presented to the Committee on Printing that would be more advantageous, by which the work could be done at less expense than the printing in the RECORD costs. If the resolution is simply to confer authority on the committee, I have no objection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I have no objection that it should go without the word "directed."

Mr. ANTHONY. But as I understand the resolution it has nothing to do with the publication of the debates; it only refers to the reporting. However they may be published, they must be reported.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I did not so understand it. If it relates to the reporting alone, I make no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. The same reports would answer for any other publication.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) explanatory of resolution approved January 31, 1868, entitled "A resolution limiting contracts for stationery and other supplies in the Executive Departments to one year;" in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

EXPLANATION—TRANSPORTATION COMMITTEE.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the consent of the Senate to make a very brief explanation, at the instance of two or three members of the Committee on Transportation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the making of a personal explanation by the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. WINDOM. I do not desire to make a personal explanation, but a brief explanation of a matter that has appeared in the public prints.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, the New York Tribune of yesterday contained an article purporting to be an abstract of a report from the Committee on Transportation. I desire to say that no such report as that referred to in the Tribune, nor any report whatever, has yet been made by said committee. A paper was prepared by myself containing a brief of the decisions of the courts on the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States. This paper, being in print, was handed to two or three members of the committee the day the Senator from Indiana made his speech on that subject. It was a private document, or intended to be so, and was prepared solely for the use and convenience of members of the committee. No one but myself is in any way responsible for the opinions therein expressed. How it was obtained for publication I do not know, but I can hardly believe it was by proper means.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance to report a bill intended to execute section 6 of the act of 1870, providing for a more equal distribution of bank circulation, and I ask that it be printed; and I give notice to the Senate that to-morrow, or as soon as the bill is printed, as I believe it has received the assent of every member of the Committee on Finance, and the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency, I shall ask for speedy action upon it. I may ask the attention of the Senate to it to-morrow, and I believe there will be no objection. It simply removes certain obstructions in the existing law which prevent the Comptroller of the Currency from carrying into execution that section which provides for a redistribution of the $25,000,000 national-bank circulation among the Western and Southern States.

The bill (S. No. 432) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870, was read and passed to a second reading.

THE BANKRUPTCY ACT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 792) to repeal the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and all laws and parts of laws amendatory thereto, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole; and the question is on the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary as a substitute for the bill.

Mr. JOHNSTON. Before the Senator from Vermont proceeds with his remarks, I desire to submit some amendments to the bankrupt bill, which I ask to have read and printed.

The Chief Clerk read the amendments, as follows:

In the third clause of section 11, act of March 2, 1867, strike out the words "and choose one or more assignees of his estate."

Strike out the whole thirteenth section of the act of March 2, 1867, and insert as follows:

The judge of each district court of the United States shall appoint a general assignee for each place at which a regular term of the court is held, and shall assign to each general assignee certain counties most convenient to the point of holding the court, and shall divide his district as equally as may be among the assignees. Before entering upon their duties, the said assignees shall take an oath of office, and shall execute before the judge, in vacation or term, as the case may be, bonds, with good security, in a penalty to be fixed by the judge, conditioned for the faithful performance of their duties. The said bonds shall be made payable to the United States, and be filed by the clerk of the court, and recorded in the order-book; and suit thereon may be prosecuted at the relation and for the benefit of any party injured. Within sixty days after the appointment and qualification of such general assignee, all assignees in his division of the district shall make to him full and detailed reports of their proceedings in each pending case and of the condition of the estate in their hands, and shall deliver to said general assignee all money, property, and choses in action, and convey all real estate in his hands as assignee. And upon failure of any of the said assignees to do this, the said general assignee shall proceed, by motion before the judge, after giving at least thirty days' notice, to require the said assignee to make such report and deliver and convey said estate, real and personal, to the general assignee.

In section 14, strike out the words, "that as soon as said assignee is appointed and qualified."

In section 18, strike out the words, "at a meeting called by order of the court, in its discretion, for the purpose, or which may be called upon the application of a majority of the creditors in number and value, the creditors may, with consent of the court, remove any assignee by such a vote as is hereinbefore provided for the choice of assignees."

Also, the words, "or at its discretion, by an election by the creditors in the manner hereinbefore provided at a regular meeting, or at a meeting called for the purpose, with such notice thereof in writing to all known creditors, and by such persons as the court shall direct."

Also the words, "no person who has received any preference contrary to the provisions of this act shall vote for or be eligible as assignee; but no title to property, real or personal, sold, transferred, or conveyed by an assignee, shall be affected or impaired by reason of his ineligibility."

At the end of section 28, act March 2, 1867, add:

The register, or any person in interest, within thirty days after the filing of said reports, may except thereto in writing, and the said report and exceptions shall be laid before the judge, in term or vacation, and be adjudicated by him.

In section 2, committee's amendments, line 5, after the word "expense," insert "and all notices of sales made by an assignee shall be published in a newspaper having the largest circulation in the county or city in which the sale is to be made."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, Mr. President, I hope we shall be permitted to go on with this bill.

Mr. THURMAN. I submit an amendment that I intend to offer to the bill, which I ask may be laid on the table for the present, and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received informally at this time, and be ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not rise, Mr. President, for the purpose of making a general speech about this bill; but I rise merely for the business purpose of explaining to the Senate the amendments which the Judiciary Committee have reported for its consideration. I only need to premise what I have to say in these explanations by saying, what every Senator perfectly understands, that it is in the first place difficult to draw the line between the interests of debtors and of creditors, and at the same time so to draw it that the interests of the community shall at the same time be subserved. This bill and a great many other bills that we pass have three sides to them, as you may say; or they have three aspects in respect to which they are important to the interests of the several portions of the community. This one, of course, is important to creditors, who want the most stringent laws for the collection of debts. They wish to get every dollar that is their due, and in the quickest possible way. That is, of course, human nature. That is their right, if you stop there. The interest of the debtor, on the other hand, is so to carry on his business, without any special regard to the payment of his debts at the day, that in time he can enrich himself and have money left after his debts are paid. The creditor therefore, on the one side, wishes to press on; the debtor, on the other side, wishes to stave off—that is, when any occasion occurs where a bankrupt law, or an attachment law, or an insolvent law is to operate at all. When society goes normally and debtors do not overtrade and get too largely in debt, and are able in the ordinary and regular course to meet their engagements, of course there is no collision between these classes.

Mr. MORTON. I should be glad for one to have the Senator from Vermont, who has charge of this bill, make a general statement of the amendments offered, of the general reform proposed, especially on those leading points, which he understands very well, that have been the subject of so much complaint in the country. If the Senator would precede the consideration of the amendments by a general statement of that kind, I think it would be satisfactory to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend from Indiana had done me the honor to hear the very opening phrase which I addressed to the Chair, he would have seen that that is precisely what I propose to do.

Mr. MORTON. I did not hear that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was only stating, as preliminary to that, and inviting the attention of the Senate to it as I explain the amendments, that it is necessary in order to have a bankrupt law at all, as it is necessary in order to have a judicial law at all, or to have a constitution at all in our country or any other, that views which taken alone are hostile to each other must in some degree give way all around, and we must meet somewhere on a common point, without insisting on every side of the Senate as to this bill or any other that our own particular view in every particular should be carried out, because no legislative body could agree to anything if it was to legislate in that way.

In order to invite the calm consideration of the Senate to this question, I was pointing out what I thought to be the philosophy of this legislation, and the necessity which I have just now stated, that we should approach it on all sides with that clear necessity in view which permeates all proper legislation about complicated subjects, that no man should feel that he has a right to insist that his particular notion as to methods and ways, or as to degrees of stringency upon one side or leniency on the other, should be carried out in spite of the opinions of everybody else, and if they cannot be, that he will not go for this bill or some other. As I intimated, the Constitution of our own country could not have been formed on any such principle. We must, therefore, approach the consideration of these amendments and of this subject with the feeling in view which I have attempted to describe as the proper one for a legislator.

Many objections were made to the present bankrupt law, and the Committee on the Judiciary, after a most careful consideration, have attempted in going over the whole bill to make provision for every case that they thought needed provision in respect to the real merits of the bill. There were a great many suggestions about minor verbal amendments, as to which we thought the law might be well enough or could be got along with well enough as it now stands, which we omitted to insert. But where it respects the merits of the rights of debtors and of creditors and of the community, we have endeavored to provide such a system as will relieve the law in the judgment of almost the entire committee, I believe, of the just objections that have been made to it. No doubt these amendments will not relieve it from criticism; they will not relieve it from complaint. That is impossible in any legislation.

And so, Mr. President, the first provision that we have made which is of substance is found in the first section of the italic print, and that provides that the court, in its discretion, in a case of bankruptcy, may authorize the receiver (who is the officer that in case of dispute as to the bankruptcy may hold the property until there is an adjudication and an election of an assignee) and the assignee, under the order of the court, to continue the business of the debtor for a period not exceeding nine months.

Difficulties, particularly in the manufacturing States, have arisen, and serious losses of property have occurred under the existing laws, in which it has been held—I do not know how rightly, but often held—that there was no power in the assignee or in the court to provide for carrying on the business of the debtor for even a limited time in order to wind up the estate more profitably. In the case of a great cotton mill, if you please, the stopping of the machinery for a month would be of much more injury to the value of the estate, as I am told by people acquainted with that species of enterprise, than running the mill at a considerable loss every day, on account of the machinery getting out of order, and rusting, and getting out of balance, &c. You may take the same as to a merchant's stock in the case of a small merchant or jobber in a city. If a jobbing merchant in the city of New York happens to fail just at the time when the fall trade is coming in from the country, it would be of the utmost importance to his creditors that for a limited time, if there was a dispute as to his going into bankruptcy, the receiver, or if he had gone into bankruptcy voluntarily or otherwise, the assignee, should be enabled to carry on his trade, keep his stock reasonably full, so as to meet his usual set of customers, and run through the trade for that time in such a way as to make a saving to the interest of everybody. So the committee in that respect have given authority to the court to provide for this thing for a period not exceeding nine months.

Then we have provided by the second section further regulations in respect to the duty of assignees. Under the existing law, which is somewhat scant in its provisions as to the duties of assignees in disposing of the property and winding up the estate, it is said that abuses have arisen in collusive sales and other contrivances between favored creditors or friends of the debtor or friends of the assignee, according to the nature of the case, by which estates have been sold at much less than the sum they ought to have realized. We have provided in the second section of our amending bill how the assignee shall sell the property, upon what notice, that he shall sell it in parcels or in whole according to the nature of the case and the best interest of all concerned, under the direction of the court; and we have provided (which is new in the scheme of the bankrupt act as it now stands) that he may sell real estate on a credit of eighteen months, payable in three equal installments, secured upon the property; so that if an estate consisting of real estate is to be wound up in bankruptcy in a time of stringency, when sales would be dull and when money would be tight, the assignee is authorized, under the direction of the court, to make sales of real estate upon a credit of eighteen months on proper security, in such a way as to have equal installments payable once in six months. But we do not provide that the whole price of the real estate shall thus wait, because the security might not be good, but that a quarter shall be paid for in cash on the spot, and the other three quarters in three intervals of six months each.

Then we have provided in the same section, by a further amendment, for the methods of settling the assignee's accounts, and requiring him to account for all interest and benefit that he may have received from the property or the money lodged in his hands, which the old law, it was supposed, did not sufficiently provide for.

In the third section of our amendments we have provided merely for the competency of all the parties as witnesses in suits by or against the assignee or the bankrupt respecting disputes concerning the estate. The rules of law upon that subject in the different States are different, and it was open to some question whether the existing statutes of the United States making parties witnesses in all cases would necessarily cover all these bankrupt questions, and this, therefore, is a mere formal enunciation of what probably the law is now.

The fourth section provides for a discharge of the compulsory bankrupt, otherwise entitled thereto, without regard to the amount of his debts or the consent of his creditors; and it provides, by a further amendment, which we have reported, that a voluntary bankrupt may be discharged upon the payment of 33 per cent. of his debts, instead of 50 per cent. as is provided in the existing law. Of course, in both these cases, allowing a bankrupt who is driven into bankruptcy by his creditors to be discharged, whatever the sum may be, he is still subject to the most stringent provisions of the existing law, that he must in no respect have been guilty of any fraud or wrong toward his creditors, and that his case presents the real instance of an honest debtor striving, with diligence and good faith, to pay all his creditors and to so dispose of and manage his estate as that he shall do them all justice in every respect. Any debtor who fails to come up to this standard of absolute honesty and good faith, both before and after his bankruptcy, and whose skirts are not therefore perfectly clean, and who does not stand as the mere victim of honest misfortune, is still obliged to submit to a vote of his creditors and to the payment of the 50 per cent. as before.

The fifth section provides for reducing the time necessary to elapse before a bankruptcy in compulsory cases, and for validating preferences. This is an important change also, and remedies in a large degree the injuries that are said to have arisen to the business of the country on account of the harshness of the bankrupt act in the upsetting of preferences and payments that debtors may innocently have made, as is supposed, within the period before which they should finally be forced into bankruptcy. The law now provides that these preferences are set aside, and payments, &c., are set aside, if the bankruptcy occurs within four months of the time of such payment in one instance, and within six months in another. We have reduced these times to two months and three months, respectively, so that the bankrupt may go on, if he does it without actual fraud, and is merely paying in the course of business and with fair faith toward the whole body of his creditors; that his affairs and theirs shall not be overhauled retroactively from the date of bankruptcy for a period exceeding in one instance two and in the other three months. We have diminished the time by one-half, which is a very great relief, it is supposed, to the business operations of the country.

Then, by the sixth section we propose to amend the thirty-fifth section of the bankruptcy act, which speaks of this period of time, and of preferences, and of frauds, &c., so as to require that the creditor who takes a preference, or to whom an improper payment, it is claimed, has been made after the man goes into bankruptcy and within this period of time, instead of having "reasonable cause to believe," as the law originally stood, shall "know" that he is doing something in receiving his payment or making his purchase that the law does not permit, and that he is committing a fraud upon the act. There is a dispute, it is true, or a question, perhaps, among lawyers, as to the extent of the real effect of this change of this particular clause in the bill. It might be held—and some courts of equity have perhaps held in some cases—that "having reasonable cause to believe" is equivalent to "knowing," and that a case of knowledge would be proved by showing a set of circumstances in which the creditor had a reasonable and sufficient cause to believe—certainly if I say sufficient cause to believe—that the fact really existed. However that may be, I am not now speaking for the committee in saying that we think it does not change the law, because I believe the body of the committee do think that it changes the law and improves the condition of the creditor above what it was when the words "reasonable cause to believe," instead of "knowing," were used; that it mitigates in favor of the creditor the severity of the existing law in that particular.

Then, the next amendment which we have suggested is to insert the words "sequestration" and "seizure," which are mere verbal amendments, evidently omitted in the original draught of the old section, and to make it conform to this.

Then, by the seventh section we have redrawn the thirty-ninth section, or the compulsory, bankruptcy section of the act of 1867 entirely; not that we have made any essential differences in the larger part of it; but we have redrawn it in order to bring it into more perfect and complete shape, so that it will read altogether as one section upon the subject of compulsory bankruptcy when it is adopted. I will point out to the Senate the changes that we have made in the thirty-ninth section of the law of 1867, and all that I do not mention that is seen in italics is the law just as it stands, word for word. On the seventh page, for instance, of this amended bill that I hold in my hand, we have extended the period during which a person must be imprisoned, or have his property under arrest, &c., from fourteen days to twenty, as a cause for bankruptcy, and we have changed the fourteen days in respect of which a debtor must have suspended payment on his commercial paper—a certain kind of paper of the merchant, banker, broker, &c.—to forty; so that the law is to be changed, according to our recommendation, in favor of the debtor in this respect, by not authorizing compulsory bankruptcy against him because his paper is suspended until the expiration of forty days, instead of fourteen, as the law now stands; to give him time, if he can, to make a peaceable arrangement with his creditors; to give him time, if he may, by sales of his property, himself be able to meet his debt without being compelled to go through the formula of winding up his whole affairs, and being turned into the street with nothing to do.

Then we have provided, which is also a new provision in this compulsory bankruptcy, that he is not then to be forced into bankruptcy without his own consent, unless upon the petition of his creditors, who shall constitute a fourth of them in number, and the aggregate of whose debts is a third of his debts in amount. This, of course, is a very considerable change in respect to the relief of debtors who, it is said, are now forced into bankruptcy by some one creditor or threatened with bankruptcy in order to induce the debtor to give that particular creditor a preference over the others, and to make payment to him which he thinks cannot be made to the others likewise. And we propose to require that, in order to compel the debtor to have his estate wound up and his business entirely stopped, there shall be a sufficient number of the whole body of his creditors to induce the reasonable belief that it is not an act of oppression, but is an act of prudent and just foresight upon the part of the creditors, finding that he is hopelessly insolvent, to have his estate disposed of for the mutual benefit of all the creditors; and so we have fixed this number at one-fourth in number and one-third in amount; and we have provided in the additional amendments that we have reported a special and easy method of having this one-fourth and one-third ascertained; so that the criticisms that were made upon the bill as first reported, whatever force they may have then had in that respect, are now disposed of, because under the additional amendments there is no difficulty at all. If one-fourth of the creditors of the debtor desire him to be a bankrupt, and one-third in amount also, there is no difficulty in attaining such concert of action, and providing means for ascertaining how much the debts are, so as to enable them to take the proceeding if they desire.

Then we have provided, what is new also, in this thirty-ninth section, to be found on the ninth page, that the person who receives any payment or conveyance referred to in the former section that I have spoken of already, must have reasonable cause to believe that the debtor was insolvent and know that fraud on his part was intended, and that such person, if a creditor, shall not, in cases of actual fraud on his part, be allowed to prove for more than a moiety of his debt. As the law now stands, if a creditor is guilty of any fraud in taking preferences from his debtor, even although he be not guilty of a moral fraud, but what is called fraud in law—if he by accident or design gains an unjust advantage over the other creditors, or attempts to do so, in getting payment when all cannot be paid, he is not entitled to prove his debt at all, and is obliged to give up the security he has taken. In the case of such a creditor, who may sometimes be, and often is, entirely innocent of any real intention to defraud the other body of creditors—innocent of any real collusion with the debtor, but who commits after all an act of fraud, we do not make the penalty against his doing that so heavy as it was before. We entitle him to prove for one-half of his debt and leave him to forfeit the other half, because in order to make this provision in securing the whole body of creditors against the grasping avarice of a few, it is necessary that a creditor who does take preferences, in order to gain a preference, or who does take a collusive sale or payment, or whatever it may be, shall have held up before his eyes the fear of some punishment or loss which is to be the consequence of this misconduct of his. I believe all the existing bankrupt laws with which I am acquainted provide in such cases that he shall not be allowed to prove at all, but shall take it out of the debtor according to his own ability afterward, and as they can arrange; as they have gone into a collusion, to leave them there; but we thought it more just, on the whole, to reduce this penalty against the misdoing creditor to the forfeiture, so far as division of assets in that estate is concerned, of one-half of the claim he had, instead of the whole.

Then we have provided in the eighth section of this bill to amend section 40 of the act of 1867, by making a provision for ascertaining whether one-fourth of the creditors in number and one-third in amount have petitioned. I have explained that sufficiently already. That is a part merely of the machinery for carrying out the provisions of the act.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. My attention was called away from his remarks for a few moments. I wish to know whether the amendment makes a single failure of negotiable paper after forty days an act of bankruptcy in itself?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir; it leaves the old law to stand exactly as it did in that respect, confined to the classes of individuals named, bankers, merchants, traders, brokers, manufacturers, and miners. It leaves the old law to stand, just as almost all, and I do not know but all, bankrupt laws have always stood, that the suspension of commercial paper for forty days of any of this selected class of individuals who are engaged in business which requires them to issue commercial paper all the time, must be taken as an act of bankruptcy, because a suspension for so great a length of time it is generally supposed, and usually turns out to be true, with that class of people, is really a failure of the man. If he cannot within that time make some arrangement with his creditors, or raise money, it would seem to be better that he should be wound up; so that we have not changed the principle of the law on that point, but have extended the time very greatly.

Then we have proposed to amend section 41 of the bankrupt act, which provides methods of proceeding in bankruptcy. We propose to amend section 41 by redrawing the last clause of it in such a way as to put the burden of proof upon the party who asserts the affirmative, so that when the question as to whether a man is bankrupt or not comes to trial before the court it is necessary that the creditor should prove that he had committed an act of bankruptcy, instead of being necessary, as the law now stands, that the debtor should prove that he had not. It is merely changing the rule of evidence in favor of the debtor.

We have also provided, which is new and important, and which does not exist in the present law, that all proceedings in bankruptcy may be discontinued on reasonable notice and hearing, with the approval of the court, with the assent in writing of the debtor and one-half of the creditors in number and amount; so that if at any time in the progress of bankruptcy proceedings the majority of the creditors in number and amount and the debtor shall agree that it is better to take the case out of court and settle it in their own way, or that the debtor should be able still to go on, or whatever it might be, the proceedings may be discontinued.

Mr. MORTON. And in that case there must be a majority of the creditors both in number and amount.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; and I believe that by the experience of all commercial codes and bankruptcies it has been found to be essential to the protection of the interests of creditors that where the majority of creditors are to act, both the number and amount must be represented. Otherwise there is a liability of combinations, as there always naturally would be, of course, in such cases, of men who had very small debts and were large in number to do something with the estate which would injure others; or, on the other hand, if you leave it to amount alone, there is always a liability of a combination or other course of action by those having large sums and being only few in number against the interest of the many, whose little debts to them are just as precious as the large ones are to the large creditors. So I think it will be agreed on all hands that it is necessary in cases of this kind that there should be intermingled, interlocked, so to speak, a certain proportion in number of creditors and a certain proportion in amount of debts in order to guard against the combinations and hostilities that would arise if you took either alone.

Then we have reported an entirely new provision, which does not exist in our present law, but which has existed in the English laws, under one form or another, for a good many years, but under substantially the form that we have adopted since 1869. It has now been five years in practice in the bankruptcy courts of Great Britain, and, so far as I am able to learn, has gone on with very eminent success, because I find that the number of cases that are disposed of under it bear a very considerable proportion to the whole number of cases brought into bankruptcy, and that the amount of satisfaction that the creditors get by what is called this composition is very handsome in comparison with going through with the whole proceedings in bankruptcy to the end; and that is the provision which we have now inserted for the first time in our bankrupt act, it not having existed in the law of 1800 or 1841—a provision for a composition.

The substance of this provision is, that in any case of bankruptcy, after a petition is filed, whether before or after adjudication, there may be a meeting of the creditors of the debtor, called upon a certain notice, which is provided for; and at that meeting of the creditors the debtor may propose to the creditors a composition; that is, he may propose to them an instrument, or a deed, or a resolution, or a paper, whatever you may call it—there is no need of any special formality about it, except to clearly state what he proposes to do—that he will pay them so much a month, or so much a year, or in whatever way, so far as paying them in cash is concerned, (because compositions always provide for that alone,) which they think, upon looking at his assets and liabilities, he may be able to do. Then, if a majority at that meeting in number and three-fourths in value agree to this proposition of the debtor, after they have had an opportunity of having him before them to make his statement of assets and liabilities, to answer any questions that shall be proposed to him, so that every creditor who attends personally or who attends by his attorney may have full information as to the condition of the debtor, what his estate consists of, what it amounts to, what its liabilities are, how rapidly they mature, and everything which would enter into the mind of a creditor as a just cause for considering whether he would give his debtor time or not; what had become of his property, if you please; how he had met with his losses; whether his misfortunes were those of unavoidable accident, like the losing of a vessel at sea, or whether they had arisen from extravagance in his private affairs, or whether they had arisen by his going into bubbling speculations, if I may use such a term; in other words, the creditors are apprised, by having the man before them and being entitled to inquire of him about all his affairs, how his losses occurred and how his property stands, and being thus enabled to judge whether they are willing to trust him to wind up his own estate and to pay them a certain sum on the dollar, they then vote; and if three-fourths in value of the creditors assembled at the meeting, and a majority in number, vote in favor of this provision for a composition, then it is to be confirmed, because some of the creditors may not have attended the meeting; and we only require a certain proportion of those who do attend in the first instance. Then this instrument is to be signed by a certain number of the creditors in value and a certain number in amount, in order to be binding upon them. That number we have left blank for the consideration of the Senate, whether they will make it still three-fourths in value and a majority in number, or whether they will reverse that and make it three-fourths in number and a majority in value.

Mr. MORTON. That is, for a composition?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is for a composition. That is the second step in the composition. In the first step, the meeting of creditors, where explanation is to be made and where the information is to be laid before them, which for the first time they may possess, only a majority in number and three-fourths in value of those who attend are necessary to open the proceeding and to say that they are satisfied to go on; and the object, then, of having a second step, that the same or some other proportion of creditors in number and amount shall show their assent by signature, is that the creditors are at this meeting for the first time supposed to be fully informed as to what the real state of the case is, and therefore we give them time to consider before they sign the instrument which shall be binding.

Supposing it to be had then, and the number agree to it which the Senate may think fit to put in, three-fourths in value and a majority in number, if you please, or whatever it may be, then this instrument is to be presented to the court. As this is dealing with private rights, and not in view of immediate liquidation, as in bankruptcy, it may go on for ten years, if you please, if the requisite number agree to it, and is therefore compelling a minority who do not, it may be, agree to it at all, it is still necessary that it shall be presented to the judge, and that he shall be satisfied that all these steps have been complied with in the first place, and in the second place that it is a fair and honest composition to make. In other words, the majority, even in this instance, are not authorized to overrule the minority and prevent a man from collecting his debt in the ordinary way, against his will, and compel him to wait for his pay longer than the regular winding up by a bankruptcy proceeding. The court must be satisfied, in short, that every man who stands out against such a proposition as this and against the will of the great bulk of the creditors and the debtor, must stand out for some selfish and captious reason. In other words, to reverse the statement, the court must be satisfied that this composition proposed is a just and honest one, and is for the real benefit of the whole body of creditors alike and of the debtor, and of course it provides that this composition shall be equal; that nobody shall get an advantage over another.

Then it also provides, just as the English law does, that the court, on application at any time, if it shall find that any injustice has been inadvertently done, or that the thing cannot be carried out through unforeseen obstacles—because the composition, when once made, leaves the debtor to go on, of course, and manage his own affairs and pay according to the terms of the deed—if it is found at any time before the composition is finally accomplished, and upon hearing and notice to everybody that it cannot be honestly and fairly carried out, through unforeseen obstacles, or any fraud that has been discovered about it, or anything of that kind, the court may set it aside and the debtor wound up in bankruptcy, or the proceedings may be discontinued, or whatever shall be thought right.

That is the substance of the composition section. Then we have provided, as the House of Representatives did, for the time being, for a reduction of one-half of the charges, disbursements, and fees in bankruptcy, except expenses. Actual moneys paid out for services, of course, we have left not to be divided in half, but to be reimbursed to the man who has to pay them. But we have added a provision which we believe to be of great value, and which we hope will relieve the law of the objections that are now made to it in respect to cumbrousness of proceedings and excessiveness of fees, by providing that this reduction of just one-half, which is, of course, perfectly arbitrary and has not any philosophy in it, "shall be and remain in force until the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States shall make and promulgate new rules and regulations in respect to the matters aforesaid;" that is, in respect to the duties and fees of the officers in bankruptcy, and under the powers that they already have under the present bankruptcy law. And then we have provided that these justices shall have power under the same provisions to simplify and consolidate the duties of all these officers, the registers, the assignees, the marshals, and clerks, in order that prolixity, delay, and unnecessary expense may be avoided. We thought that could be much better done by the judges of the Supreme Court, as they go upon the circuits and know the practical operation of these things, than it could be done by legislation; and when they will revise this matter and simplify and consolidate these duties and cause the fee bills to be reduced as far as is necessary, there will be no just grounds of complaint in the administration of this law any more than in other judicial proceedings.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator allow me a remark?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have not the bill before me, but where it speaks of the power of the court to regulate the duties of the various officers, if I understand him aright, he means to include also the fees in certain cases.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It includes both.

Mr. HAMLIN. As the Senator read it, he used only the word "duties;" he did not use the word "fees;" but I will inquire if the language is satisfactory to himself, so that it will include both? "Duties" are one thing and "fees" another.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We took the House bill and changed one single word as to expenses. The House bill provided that these officers should have only half the expenses they actually paid out. We thought that was a little too hard upon them. Aside from necessary and actual disbursements, we just took the House bill, and then we added this proviso:

Provided, That this section shall be and remain in force until the justices of the Supreme Court of the United States shall make and promulgate new rules and regulations in respect to the matters aforesaid, under the powers conferred upon them by sections 10 and 47 of said act, and no longer.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is sufficient.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, sections 10 and 47 of the act give the Supreme Court complete power over the subject of forms of proceedings, over the subject of fees, and regulations of the duties of these officers.

Mr. President, the real difficulty under the law as it now stands upon this point, and I may perhaps as well state it here as anywhere, in respect to what are said to be enormous fees, (and in many instances I have no doubt they are, because they certainly are under State laws, as I have found by observation and experience,) is, not in the law, not in the regulation, but in the fact that suitors, if you call them such, in bankruptcy proceedings do not defend their rights. If a man goes into a State court in my State, and recovers a judgment or suffers one against him upon a litigation, the law prescribes how much the sheriff shall have, how much the clerk shall have, how much shall be paid to the jury, how much shall be paid for fees and all the steps that are necessary in judicial proceedings. Now what happens—and it happens in every State of the Union, it happens in every civilized country under every possible system of jurisprudence? It happens that unless the suitors who are interested, through honest attorneys, will defend themselves against extortion, the sheriff will double his charge, the clerk will treble his, and so on and so on. What is necessary, therefore?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. May I ask my colleague whether there is anything in the proposed amendment to prevent constructive mileage on the part of marshals and registers?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; there is no provision in that regard, because the provision is already in the existing law. Actual travel only is allowed by law, and no marshal gets anything but actual travel, unless he be doing precisely the thing that I am describing, that the sheriffs of the State do and marshals of the United States do in proceedings in court; that is, tax a bill that he has no right to have paid to him, and it goes through because nobody opposes it or attends to it.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. In regard to mercantile paper going over forty days, I ask him to state how such failure may affect the indorsers who do not belong to the classes enumerated; whether it is an act of bankruptcy on the part of the indorser?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; it is not. That has been held over and over again.

Mr. MORTON. Under the provisions of your bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not affect the indorsers. Nobody is put into bankruptcy but the class of persons enumerated, the merchant, trader, broker, &c., and it has been decided, so that the construction is settled under the existing law, that the bankruptcy of the principal does not make a bankrupt of the man who indorses him, although he, if it were his own paper, would be bankrupt by letting it lie forty days.

While I am on the subject of costs, because I believe I have gone through with the chief explanation of the amendments that we propose, I may say that we addressed a letter to the justices of the Supreme Court on the subject of the sections which give them the power to make regulations and to regulate fees and costs and so on, and their reply states in substance what I have just stated, and what is true everywhere, that the complaints that have arisen under this law, in the respects of which I am now speaking, are due in ninety-nine cases in a hundred not to the law, not to the regulation, but to the administration of it, precisely as similar abuses exist everywhere in jurisprudence, State, national, or that of any other country, unless people who are interested in the fund or in their rights in court come forward and take care of them. The reply of the justices of the Supreme Court is as follows:

SIR: Your favor of the 2d instant was duly received and submitted to the justices of the Supreme Court, who, after considering it, have directed me to make the following reply:

Immediately upon the passage of the bankrupt law, a committee of three of the justices was appointed to make report to the court of the necessary action required by section 10 of that law.

This committee made their report, and with such qualifications as the justices as a body thought necessary, it was established and published as the rules and general orders in bankruptcy before the time fixed for the commencement of proceedings under the act. This committee was continued as a standing committee, and all suggestions of modifications in the rules were referred to them. Very little change was made until the December term, 1871, when the whole subject underwent a full review by the committee and by the court, the result of which was considerable modifications of these rules, and especially rule 30, on the subject of fees and compensation of officers. A copy of these rules will be handed you with this communication, and your attention is called to this rule, and especially to the clauses marked. The subject of the fee-bill received careful and protracted consideration, and the justices are of opinion that not much, if any, reduction can safely be made in fees fixed by their rules.

I am directed to call your attention to that provision of section 10 which confers upon us the power of regulating fees payable and costs allowed, except such as are established by this act or by law. The fees of the clerk of the district court are generally such as would come under some provision of the fee-bill established by the act of Congress of 26th of February, 1853, and were no doubt those referred to with some of the marshal's as fees "established by law."

Looking to section 47 of the bankrupt act you will perceive a fee-bill established by that act, which is, by the terms of section 10, excepted from our control. This fee-bill, as we are advised, is the source of the greatest complaint, especially the charge for a day's service, which is by the statute limited to five dollars, but the allowance is required to be made by the district court. We have not felt ourselves at liberty to interfere with that or any other of the fees fixed by this forty-seventh section.

In making a rule by which every fee-bill should be taxed by a standing auditor appointed by the court, subject to be determined by the court, and in requiring, of the assignee, regular and frequent reports of his proceedings and of the funds in his hands, and in providing for a summary mode of recovering back fees illegally exacted or received, we believed we had exhausted our power on the subject.

The enforcement of these rules, and of all the provisions of the act, must rest with the district courts. And as the register and assignees are the parties of whom complaint is generally made, and as they are the active parties in the administration of the law, it is quite certain that no system will secure absolute observance of all these rules which does not provide for more attention on the part of the scattered creditors or more vigilant supervision by the district court. Rules are as useless here as in other places when they are not enforced by some controlling power.

We have only to add that no special complaints are now pending before us, and no additional measures are in contemplation.

Very respectfully,

NATHAN CLIFFORD.

Hon. GEORGE F. EDMUNDS,
Chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate.

Now, sir, what we do in Vermont when a sheriff taxes a bill in a suit against a person that the statute does not provide for—or what we used to do when I was at the bar there—was to bring the sheriff before the proper officer and tax his bill down to the truth, and then no man was obliged to pay more costs than the law provided for. And then we have a statute—and we have so provided in this case, although there is a provision probably that covers it in the old law—punishing any officer of a court who taxes an illegal bill knowingly; he is obliged to refund ten for one.

I say, therefore, Mr. President, (and I lay some stress upon this because there has been a great deal of complaint, and gentlemen have been apparently disgusted with the law upon this point,) that we ought not to repeal a law which is beneficial of itself from the fact that the officers who administer it do precisely what the officers who administer your judicial system and every other judicial system do. Unless they are brought by the hand of the party who has an interest in it to face the law and obey it, they will certainly go in excess of it and will get more money than they are entitled to have; but when they are, there is no difficulty in reducing the fees.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, with the consent of the Senator from Vermont, before he concludes, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the provisions of the eleventh section, I believe, of the bankruptcy act. It is a section which provides for notice to the creditor, and it does not seem to give the judge any discretion. That notice must be either by mail or personally. Now this case, I am advised by the judge of the court in my own State, has existed there. A newspaper publisher either voluntarily went into or was forced into bankruptcy. He had a large list of subscribers who had paid in advance for their paper, and having paid in advance and he having gone into bankruptcy, they were creditors of the estate; I think the judge states there were between nine and ten thousand of them; and there had therefore to be actual notice, personally or through the mails, and it was found that the cost of issuing those notices exceeded the amount of the assets, which was very small. The suggestion made is that there should be some provision in these small cases clothing the court with a discretionary power to give public notice through the papers to be rid of this expense of notifying so many. The Senator from Vermont may recollect that I called his attention to this subject and had an interview with him upon it, and I now ask him if he has considered it, and if so what is his conclusion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Since the time my friend called my attention to that subject I have not had time to consult with more than one or two gentlemen of the committee, but on looking at the law I find it contains the apparent defect of which he speaks, and I have prepared an amendment which will provide, in substance, that in cases of that character, where the expense of personal service would be extravagant and onerous to the estate, the small creditors, not exceeding fifty dollars, for instance, may be notified by publication in a newspaper, if the judge should think fit, instead of by personal notice.

Mr. HAMLIN. That would meet the case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. At the proper time I shall offer that amendment, although, as I say, I have not had the sanction of the committee, for I have not had time to consult with them on the subject. Now, I hope we shall take up the amendatory bill by sections and consider it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask my friend from Vermont whether there is any difficulty in limiting the proceedings in bankruptcy to cases where the amount exceeds, say two, or three, or four, or five thousand dollars. Is there any constitutional difficulty in prohibiting proceedings in bankruptcy in all the multiplied cases where the amount of liabilities is less than, say, two or three thousand dollars? The reason I ask the question is because some complaints have been made to me, and my attention has been called to the fact that proceedings in bankruptcy have been used in the nature of a threat against small dealers, who, from the very nature of their business, the extent of their business, the smallness of their assets, the smallness of their liabilities, ought to be freed from proceedings in a United States district court a hundred miles away, the mere cost of which, the terrors of which, would be greater to them probably than the charge of a petty offense. Could not some provision be inserted in the thirty-ninth section of the law, on the seventh page of this bill, limiting proceedings to cases where the amount of liability exceeds two or three thousand dollars?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can only speak for myself on that subject, because the committee did not consider it directly upon that point, but merely in the general way of leaving the $250, or whatever it is now, as it stood in the old law, as there had been no special complaint on that point that was brought to our notice in the dozens, I might say hundreds, of letters and petitions on the subject we had received. Speaking for myself, I would say that there was no constitutional objection to making the limit $1,000, as well as to making it $100 or $200.

Mr. SHERMAN. The objection is based upon the word "uniform."

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would be just as uniform with the limit of $1,000 in my opinion, but I only speak for myself, as it would be at $250. The only objection to a provision of that kind, in respect to traders, would be this, and in the section of country which I represent particularly it would be a serious objection: Under the State laws as they are in my own State, I am sorry to say, preferences can be given to creditors in every variety of way almost; they can be obtained by creditors in spite of the honest intention of the debtor to divide his property equally among his creditors, by an attachment the very moment a debtor fails. The day after his note becomes due, be it small or great, the creditor has the common-law right to sue him then, and to get his right, not on obtaining judgment, but then by attachment, as we call it, of his property; and it is so in a great many States. Now, the difficulty, if you put the limit up to any considerable amount, would be that there would be opened again a temptation which has been found injurious to creditors, injurious to debtors, injurious to society I believe everywhere, of having the debtor made the master himself in effect, in one case, of the disposition of his own effects, to his uncles, and his aunts, and his cousins, and his favorites, with all sorts of collusion which cannot be got at in small cases, by the slow process of a creditor's bill in equity, which would use up any estate worse than all the bankruptcy proceedings ever heard of, and never get to an end. There would be no way of meeting that class of people who should not choose to be honest. Then when you turn around to those who are honest and who fall within the class that my friend is speaking of, they are exposed in a great many of the States to be instantly broken up because they are small and are unable to pay a small sum to some creditor, who just seizes all they have on a small debt, obtains a judgment in a very few days, as he can in most of the States, where the debtor is honest, because the debtor cannot put in a false defense; he must confess, "I owe this money and I cannot pay it," and his property is sold in fourteen days, and the consequent ruin to him on the whole is vastly greater than it would be if he should be able to say to this harsh and avaricious creditor, "You cannot sue me and take my property, Mr. A, because I cannot pay this note to-day, or did not pay it a month ago; you will get no advantage by it, because doing that will only oblige me to divide among all my creditors, when you will get only a very small portion of your money; but if you will suffer me, knowing I am honest, to go on, as my other creditors are willing to suffer me, and do not sue me at law and break up my business, you will get all in a year." I submit, therefore, to my friend from Ohio whether it is not better to bear the inconveniences that he suggests, in view of the countervailing considerations which I have stated.

Mr. SHERMAN. The inquiry I made was in regard to the involuntary bankruptcy section. I can imagine a case where a debtor, believing himself oppressed by his creditors, might seek the relief of the bankrupt law to prevent undue advantage in favor of particular creditors, or to prevent a hard creditor from getting an advantage in the settlement of his estate, where probably it would be right enough for him to appeal to the bankrupt law to protect the rest of his creditors; but it seems to me when parties force a man into involuntary bankruptcy for the specific causes recited at length in section 39, they ought also to allege that the amount of his liability is such as would give jurisdiction to a high court. My suggestion, therefore, would be to relieve the small traders of the country. There are in all the States, and especially in the Western States, a great many people whose entire business is bounded by one or two thousand dollars.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But my friend will see, if he will pardon me, that the consideration that he is now naming, about involuntary bankruptcy, is entirely ameliorated by the provision that the power of the one creditor to force a man into bankruptcy, if he is a small man, instead of suing him at law, is entirely taken away, and there must be the concurrence of opinion of a quarter of the creditors, having one-third of the amount of the debts of the man, before they can force him to be wound up; so that it is not in the power any longer of a harsh and avaricious creditor, by threatening the debtor, to compel him to pay him in some way when he cannot pay all. The debtor is placed in a position of independence of him. It is only when there is a considerable body of the creditors who are of the opinion that the case is so hopeless that the estate ought to be wound up, instead of being an instance of a temporary misfortune which ought to be waited upon, that the creditors themselves can move at all. That, I think, will answer entirely the difficulty suggested by my friend, that the small traders in Ohio, if our amendments are adopted, are at the mercy of any one large creditor.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no doubt that the amendment proposed now is a great improvement of the old section 39, and it seems to have been very carefully considered. Still I come back to the point; there have been cases to which my attention has been called, in regard to this very bill, where the threat of the bankrupt law has been used to a very great extent. The old provision of the law, which authorized a small trader to be forced into bankruptcy because he happened to have his paper run by in bank, or among the people for fourteen days, was absolutely oppressive. By the common custom in the country, people are not expected to be so prompt in paying debts as in other places. They are not commercial communities. If a farmer pays once a year promptly, and squares up with everybody, he is considered a very excellent paymaster. It is better perhaps to cultivate a habit in this country of prompt payment; but the habit is not common in the rural districts throughout the country. I think, taking all the Northwestern States, it is the common habit among farmers to settle but once a year. That is as often as they expect to be called upon to settle up with their merchants, and the merchant is embarrassed sometimes by the delay of the payment of his debtors in such a way that he cannot pay up promptly. Sometimes the farmers will refuse to sell their produce until they can get a little higher price. The price is not so high as they think it ought to be, and they ask time, and take time, and there is no way to compel them to pay. Hence small traders throughout the country are often embarrassed and absolutely unable to comply with their obligations.

Now this bill, as reported, does not give them as much relief as I had hoped would be given them. It only extends the time from fourteen to forty days. If one of these small traders allows his paper to remain unpaid for forty days, and is not able to pay it, or compound with his creditor, or make an arrangement with him, his hands are tied up in some measure by having committed an act of bankruptcy. After having neglected to pay his paper so long, he cannot propose an arrangement, lest the creditor refuse to make it with him, lest he may be charged with violating the law against preferences of creditors. It seems to me that the old bankrupt law, and this one to a less extent, will be made the medium of oppression in that way. It strikes me that it could be ameliorated in several particulars. Forty days is entirely too short a time, in my judgment, for the State in which I live for the mere non-payment of a debt.

Then it seems to me the compulsory clauses ought to be confined to those who may be regarded under the English law as traders, men engaged in commerce; not mere dealers in small traffic all over the country. I think it would take away a great deal of the terror and oppression of the bankrupt law if it was confined to merchants or traders in the English sense.

Mr. THURMAN. The English include fifty people that we do not, even tavern-keepers.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let me suggest to my friend from Ohio whether it would not be more convenient, and whether we should not get on faster, to take up the propositions we have made, one by one, and have the discussion on them as they arise.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not the slightest objection. I merely suggested these matters to call out inquiry as to whether they had been examined in committee.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, I desire to make one suggestion to the Senator from Ohio. My experience is quite the reverse of his in the matter of which he has spoken. I have found the attachment laws of the States more oppressive to small creditors than the bankrupt law, because there the principle was, "first come, first served," and creditors were more likely to oppress debtors by reason of the attachment laws where I have lived than under the bankrupt law. Of course, you can have no law under which a creditor who is disposed to oppress a small debtor may not do him harm. This bankrupt law is certainly better than the State attachment laws; it takes away much of the inducement to oppression by creditors. My experience has been that it has worked satisfactorily. If you exempt one or two thousand dollars, you have this same door opened to fraud, to buying a small stock of goods and having them in the name of a cousin or a brother, and when they get to the place where they are to be disposed of, you have the same difficulty in having them attached on a small claim. The bankrupt law certainly has improved the condition of the country in the way of honest dealing. I think if you undertake to dispense with the bankrupt law you will find that there will be other laws in operation which will be much more oppressive.

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator from Vermont inform me to what section of the original law the first and second sections of the amendment of the committee apply? I have the statute before me; but the sections of the amendment are silent on that point.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The first section does not apply to any section of the existing law.

Mr. INGALLS. Where does it come in?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not come into the original law, but it comes into this bill for the first time as an amendatory bill, which we make section 1 of this amendatory bill. It is an independent and fresh provision. The second section is also an entirely new section, which is not to be attached to any particular section of the existing law, but is a continuation of the legislation on the subject.

Mr. INGALLS. Under what head of the statute does it come?

Mr. EDMUNDS. In the original statute it would come under the head of "the power of the court over receivers, and of proceedings pending the first part of bankruptcy"—that is, the carrying on of the business. It would come where the duties of the assignee are provided for, where the duties of the receiver are provided for, and the powers of the court over them. There we provide that the court shall have this power to have the business carried on for nine months. It is not as an amendment to the phraseology of the old law in that respect, but is an independent proposition.

Mr. INGALLS. I noticed that the other sections provided for amendments to specific sections of the present law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but as these were entirely new schemes we insert them bodily as fresh legislation. In the other cases we have provided for making section 3 of the law read so and so, because the phraseology of those other sections was changed, and we have in some instances had them entirely redrawn, so that the whole matter would read consecutively in the amendatory law.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I wish to say to my colleague that if he desires to take the sense of the Senate on the amendments that he suggests, he can do so at the proper time by moving after the word "provable," on the first line of page 8, some such words as these, "and whose debts shall amount to at least $500," which would make the aggregate of all the debts amount to $1,500. He can in some such form as that try that question. It is very probable, however, that upon reflection and close examination of this amendment, he will find that debtors are protected against any black-mailing operations if this bill shall become a law. Indeed, in the multitude of letters received by the Judiciary Committee and by the members thereof, reviewing the bill reported by us, and which we reported on the 5th day of January and suffered to lie in order that we might have the benefit of all the criticisms of the bar, and of the bench, and of the merchants and business men of the community, I think the only criticism that this provision in the bill has undergone is that it is too unfavorable to bankrupt proceedings at all, that it tends to defeat anything like bankrupt proceedings, and that we might as well repeal the law. In that the critics were in error; but that, I think the members of the committee will bear me out in saying, has been the tenor of the only criticism that this section of the bill has received.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And that was based upon not understanding what it provided for.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, that was based upon not properly understanding it. But it was not for the purpose of going into any particular detail that I arose. What I wish to say in general terms is this: Between the present bankrupt law and no law on the subject at all, I should be in favor of no law. I would vote for the House bill to repeal the whole law rather than see the present law stand, and that was my opinion before I began a critical investigation of the law and of the decisions and practices under it, and that impression was immensely strengthened by that examination. But between no law at all and a proper bankrupt law, one that is contemplated by the Federal Constitution for reasons that were satisfactory to the framers of that instrument, and that have commended themselves to the opinion of enlightened judges and enlightened business men ever since the Constitution was adopted, although a bankrupt law has not all the time prevailed—between such a law as that, a proper bankrupt law, and no law at all, I am in favor of a bankrupt law. And being perfectly well satisfied in my own mind that a majority of the Senate would prefer a reasonable and efficient bankrupt law to the bill sent us from the House of Representatives, I have, in common with the other members of the Judiciary Committee, labored hard and labored long to present such a bill to the Senate; and I believe that we have succeeded in maturing a bill which will recommend itself to the favorable consideration of all who will carefully study it.

I think it will be well, in the consideration of this bill, for us to take up the proposed amendments of the committee and consider them, instead of testing the strength of the question of repeal in the first instance. I think we had better see into what shape we can put this substitute before the question shall be put on striking out all of the House bill after the enacting clause, and I therefore concur with the wish expressed by the chairman of the committee that we shall take it up now and proceed with it section by section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) If there be no objection, the substitute reported by the committee will be so taken up. Is it the desire of Senators that the section shall be reported again?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better have one at a time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They have been read all through, but I have some amendments to move to the amendments proposed by the committee, and if it is more satisfactory to any gentleman we can have them read all through again.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a very important matter, and most of us have not had time to read the whole scheme carefully; and I think we had better read the sections seriatim, as they do in the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first section will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first section of the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary is as follows:

That the court may, in its discretion, on sufficient cause shown, and upon notice and hearing, direct the receiver or assignee to take possession of the property, and carry on the business of the debtor, or any part thereof, when, in its judgment, the interest of the estate as well as of the creditors will be promoted thereby, but not for a period exceeding nine months from the time the debtor shall have been declared a bankrupt.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the section just read.

The section was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next section will be read.

Mr. INGALLS. Would it not be better to place the section just acted on in the original law? It appears to me that it would properly come under section 17 of the statute.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would recite to my friend that this bill, if it passes at all, will be a bill entirely amendatory of, and supplementary to, the act of 1867, and referring to that act when we change the title, as the Senator will see at the end of the print; and here we merely make a general provision additional to those already existing by law, that the court shall have a particular power.

Mr. INGALLS. It was not the intention of the committee, then, to report an entire bill on the subject?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next section will be reported.

Mr. SHERMAN. As it is a mere matter of taste, I shall not make a point of it; but if the Senator from Vermont will read his title, which defines very properly the object of this bill, and then read this section as section 1, it seems to me rather abrupt—"That the court may," &c.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will gratify my friend about that when we get through. When the question comes on striking out the whole House bill and inserting this, we can put in as first words, "That the act entitled an act," &c., "is hereby amended as follows."

Mr. SHERMAN. I merely speak of it as a matter of taste, as this section, it seems to me, is rather abrupt in its beginning.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am obliged to my friend for the suggestion. When we come to that, we shall have that done.

The second section was read, as follows:

SEC. 2. That unless otherwise ordered by the court, the assignee shall sell the property of the bankrupt, whether real or personal, at public auction, in such parts or parcels and at such times and places as shall be best calculated to produce the greatest amount with the least expense. And the court, on the application of any party in interest, shall have complete supervisory power over such sales, so that the property sold shall realize the largest sum. And the court may, in its discretion, order any real estate of the bankrupt, or any part thereof, to be sold for one-fourth cash in hand at the time of sale, and the residue in three equal installments, bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, and payable at intervals of not more than six months between any two payments, and secured by proper mortgage or lien upon the property so sold. And it shall be the duty of every assignee to keep a regular account of all moneys received or expended by him as such assignee, to which account every creditor shall, at reasonable times, have free access. If any assignee shall fail or neglect to well and faithfully discharge his duties in the sale or disposition of property as above contemplated, it shall be the duty of the court to remove such assignee, and he shall forfeit all fees and emoluments to which he might be entitled in connection with such sale. And if any assignee shall, in any manner, in violation of his duty aforesaid, unfairly or wrongfully sell or dispose of, or in any manner fraudulently or corruptly combine, conspire, or agree, with any person or persons, with intent to unfairly or wrongfully sell or dispose of the property committed to his charge, he shall, upon proof thereof, be removed, and forfeit all fees or other compensation for any and all services in connection with such bankrupt's estate, and, upon conviction thereof before any court of competent jurisdiction, shall be liable to a fine of not more than $1,000, or imprisonment in the penitentiary for a term of not exceeding two years, or both fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court. And any person so combining, conspiring, or agreeing with such assignee for the purpose aforesaid, shall, upon conviction, be liable to a like punishment.

And on any settlement of the accounts of any assignee, he shall be required to account for all interest, benefit, or advantage received, or in any manner agreed to be received, directly or indirectly, from the use or deposit of any of the funds coming to his hands as such assignee. And he shall be required, upon such settlement, to make and file in court an affidavit declaring, according to the truth, whether he has or has not, as the case may be, received, or is or is not, as the case may be, to receive, directly or indirectly, any interest, benefit, or advantage from the use or deposit of such funds; and such assignee may be examined orally upon the same subject, and if he shall willfully swear falsely, either in such affidavit or examination, he shall be deemed to be guilty of perjury, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than one and not more than three years.

Mr. PRATT. I propose to amend this section in the eighth line by inserting after the word "sum" the words, "and may order an appraisement to be made of the property of the bankrupt in whole or in part, by a reputable and disinterested freeholder of the neighborhood where the debtor lives, to be selected by the assignee, and require that upon the sale such property shall bring at least two-thirds of the appraised value of the same."

Mr. THURMAN. Does the Senator mean personal as well as real property?

Mr. PRATT. I do; and I will state why. I have known some very great abuses under the operation of the old law. A case came under my knowledge where notes to the amount of $2,000 were secured by a mortgage on real estate, unquestionably good security, but they were sold at a sacrifice of about 75 per cent. The whole notes commanded only $500 on the sale. This amendment of mine does not make it obligatory on the court to order an appraisement. It simply confers on the court the discretion to order that the property of the debtor in whole or in part may be appraised. There is nothing obligatory about it. It is simply a matter of discretion to prevent a sacrifice.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senate will not agree to this amendment. I can see the force of what my friend says, that a case might arise where there would be a great sacrifice; but in the case that he has made, a sacrifice of that character must have been a collusive one, where the court would set aside sale and all on having the proof come to its notice. But my friend must not forget that the object of this bankrupt law is to provide for the disposition of the property of the debtor for the payment of his debts, and that money must be realized. If the Senator will look at all the relieving provisions that we have inserted in the old law in respect of giving discretion to the court, continuing business, regulating the conduct of assignees, and all that sort of thing, and the provision which has been already inserted in respect to selling on time, selling on notice, and selling by parcels, he will see that every provision has been made for the benefit of the debtor and of the estate which I think can be made in consistency with the general object of the provision itself, which is to secure the winding up of the estate, the converting of it into money, and the dividing of it among the creditors.

This will be equivalent to requiring the court to order an appraisement, because if you put it in even in the form of discretion, the first thing would have to be, in case of any desire on the part of anybody to hang back, "I must go to the expense of having a fresh person appointed to make an appraisal of this;" and then, after all the notices and the expenses of the sale have been gone through, if the bidding does not come up to two-thirds of the appraisal the court will declare that it is no sale. Meanwhile the property may be depreciating all the time, the security may become bad; and then you are obliged to resort again to the rest of the estate for the expense of going through the entire fresh proceeding of selling it over again, first having a reappraisement.

I submit to my friend in all seriousness that when he looks on both sides of this difficult question he ought to agree with me in saying that, as we have provided for enforcing good faith on the part of the assignee and giving time on sales of real estate and resisting all plots and combinations and collusions to have the estate go too low, it will be reasonably satisfactory; whereas if you burden it with this also, I am afraid it is going too far in the other direction. I hope my friend will not press the amendment.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, we are trying to get rid of some of the objectionable features of the old law. I do not know whether the experience of the Senator from Vermont agrees with my own; but in the section of country where I live, the result of the settlement of bankrupt estates has been that the assignee, the register, the marshal, the clerk, and the attorneys have absorbed the whole, and the creditors have got nothing. I think I have been served with a dozen or fifteen notices by the marshal that this debtor or that debtor had applied to be bankrupt; and I do not think I ever received a solitary farthing in the shape of a dividend from any of them.

Now, my amendment is looking to the creditor; it is proposing to produce some result from these sales. So far as my experience extends, the property of the bankrupt, as a general rule, has never sold for one-half of its actual value.

I do not propose this as an absolute rule; but I propose to vest this discretion in the judge: that, whenever circumstances seem to warrant it, he may order, not the entire property of the debtor to be appraised, but such property as he sees proper to be subjected to an appraisement, and require that upon sale it shall bring a certain proportion of its appraised value. If it is thought that two-thirds is too large, let it be so amended as to substitute one-half, so that, upon sale, it shall bring one-half of its appraised value. But I want the property to bring something. I am looking to the creditor side of the question.

Mr. WRIGHT. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana follows a sentence which gives to the court a complete surpervisory power over all sales by the assignee, and for the purpose stated, that the property sold shall realize the largest sum. By this provision power is given to the court to protect the interest of the bankrupt, as also the interests of all persons interested in the estate. We are by these provisions making general rules in connection with these estates and the winding up of these affairs. My experience is, that when we attempt to legislate because of some case of supposed individual hardship, and to throw that into a general law, the chances are that we are legislating in the wrong direction. Now, when this entire power has been given to the court to thus regulate and supervise the matter, it seems to me that that ought to be sufficient for the Senator from Indiana.

Then, again, so far as this amendment is concerned, I think there are two very serious objections to its language. In the first place, why give the assignee the power to select this "disinterested and reputable freeholder?" Why shall he have the power to select the person to make this appraisement? Then why shall it be confined to one person? By the laws of most States, where property is appraised three persons at least are selected to make such appraisement; and why shall the entire power to make such appraisement be lodged in the hands of one person, and he selected by the assignee?

I suggest that the property of the bankrupt is sufficiently protected already by the provision of the section which is sought to be amended by the Senator from Indiana; and that he, because of some case of individual hardship, now seeks to ingraft upon this law a provision that I think will work harshly and improperly as a general rule. So far as his reference is concerned to the manner in which estates have been wound up, and his statement that his experience is that but little if any money has been realized, giving his own experience in illustration of it, I perhaps might suggest to him that his case is probably not unlike that of most lawyers who are unfortunate in having bad clients.

This point was very carefully considered by the committee, and after the most careful consideration it was deemed best that this amendment should be omitted, and that we should leave the power, as it is now, with the judge, giving him an entire supervisory control of the whole matter.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to say very briefly a word on this amendment, and that for the reason that I have a very high opinion of appraisement laws, not merely for the sake of the debtor, but also for the protection of the creditor. I recollect very well a remark made by one of the most distinguished chief justices who ever presided in Ohio, and who was for twenty-one years a member of the supreme court of that State, that of all the provisions in the statute-book he knew of none more beneficial to creditors than that which required an appraisement of real estate before it should be sold on execution, preventing fraud in the sale of real estate by collusion between the debtor, who generally has the sympathy of his neighbors and the officer making the sale. And therefore I was inclined to an amendment, so far as real estate was concerned, something like that suggested by the Senator from Indiana; but on reflection it seems to me that, with the provisions which are already proposed in this bill, that amendment may be dispensed with.

There is this difference between sales upon execution under judgments of courts, whether Federal or State, and proceedings in bankruptcy: Where the sale is upon an execution, the laws of most of the Western States require an appraisement, but it is foreseen that often the property will not sell for two-thirds of that appraisement, and hence in most of the statutes it is further provided that if the property has been offered twice and will not bring two-thirds of the appraisement, the court may set aside that appraisement and order a new appraisement, and so on from time to time until the property shall be appraised so low that it will bring two-thirds of the appraisement, or until times have improved, more greenbacks have been issued, and there is more money in the country, and people are ready to invest at two-thirds of the appraisement. Now it is within the experience of every lawyer of large practice in a State where these appraisement laws prevail that very often a piece of real estate remains unsold for as many as four or five years; but it is not the interest or purpose of a bankrupt law to have the estate in administration for any such period as that. A bankrupt law well administered ought to bring the administration of the estate to a very speedy conclusion. I am therefore distrustful of any provision the tendency of which is to aggravate an evil already too great, the prolonging the administration of bankrupt estates until almost every small creditor is in the category of my friend from Indiana—forgets that he has any claim there at all; never goes near the bankrupt court to find whether there is any dividend in his affair; and the whole thing is finally swept into a pool that some more diligent creditor gets.

I doubt, therefore, the propriety of that; but in respect to personal estate, I do not think there are many States in which personal estate is required to be valued by an officer selling it on execution. We did have such a statute for awhile in Ohio, but we got rid of it very soon, for it was found not to work well; and here I do not think it would work well; certainly it would be very much in conflict with other provisions of this law which have operated beneficially. For instance, there are times when you must sell perishable articles, and you must sell them instantly; and to sell them is the best thing you can do with them. There are cases in which it is advisable to sell at private sale; and accordingly one of the general orders made by the Supreme Court, and which that court is authorized by the bankrupt law to make, provides that in certain cases the court may order personal property to be sold at private sale.

What I have just said suggests another answer to this amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana. The Supreme Court is vested by this law with power to make general orders for the government of all inferior courts exercising bankruptcy powers and all officers who act in the execution of those powers; and in the exercise of that authority conferred upon the Supreme Court they have made some very salutary rules in respect to the sale of both real and personal estate, and can make just as many more as they see fit, in their discretion and with their experience, to make.

I think, in view of these facts and of the extremely stringent and highly penal law which the very section now under consideration is and which we have reported for the punishment of frauds by assignees, there is no necessity to delay bankrupt proceedings by requiring appraisements of property. If you do, and the property does not sell—if it is personal, it may perish; if it is real, you must have a further provision for setting aside that appraisement if the property will not sell for two-thirds of it, and you may have years upon years of delay, while the administration is being eaten up with costs and the creditors kept out of their dues.

Mr. MORTON. It seems to me that there is necessity for some such amendment as that offered by my colleague. One of the great complaints made against the old bankrupt law is that property has been continually sacrificed under it; that property has been sold at assignee's sale for a fourth of what it was worth, so that the bankrupt's estate has paid scarcely anything of his debts. I had a conversation the other day with one of the largest wholesale merchants in the city of Cincinnati, whom my friend behind me [Mr. SHERMAN] very well knows, and he told me that his house in Cincinnati had been interested in forty-four cases of bankruptcy, and had never yet received a dividend from any one of them. If an assignee is fraudulent, disposed to be guilty of fraud, to collude with friends, he can so manage a sale as to have property sacrificed—bought in by his friends or parties in interest with him at a very small part of what it is actually worth.

Mr. THURMAN. If the courts do their duty, he cannot do it long.

Mr. MORTON. The court may have no means of getting at it. The fact that the court may supervise that sale and set it aside is some protection in a very gross case; but there must be somebody to bring it before the court, and who must be able to make the court understand that there has been a sacrifice, while the assignee on the other hand, or the man who has bought the property, is interested in maintaining the sale, and that of itself makes another controversy. In nearly all the States the courts have power to set aside a sale made by a sheriff or made by an administrator or an executor. I think that is a general power given to the State courts to set aside sales where the inadequacy of price is such as to give rise to the presumption of fraud. That is not a new power; but that has not been found sufficient to protect the debtor, and it has been found necessary in nearly all the States to establish appraisement laws. I agree with the Senator from Ohio that appraisement laws are highly beneficial, and it is my observation where I have practiced law that where property was fairly appraised, intelligently appraised, and the sale properly advertised, it would generally bring at least two-thirds of its appraised value. It is an exception where it does not. There is not much difficulty in selling property at two-thirds of its fairly appraised value; and it seems to me that there is more danger to be apprehended from omitting an amendment like that offered by my colleague than there is on the other hand from its insertion.

But I would suggest one thing to him, and that is that this amendment does not properly provide for the appraisement. I think there should be more than one appraiser, and I do not think it should be left entirely to the assignee to select the appraisers. I think the debtor himself should have the choice of at least one of these appraisers, because the charge is in different States, and we know that in some States it has been very prominent, that the assignee was the fraudulent party who had sacrificed men's estates and himself grown rich while the debtors were ruined and the creditors got nothing. If the selection of the sole appraiser is left entirely to the assignee, he can find some convenient instrument perhaps in every neighborhood to make that appraisement of such character that the property will still be sacrificed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not wish to prolong discussion upon minor points, but this, perhaps, in a certain sense may be more than a minor point. My friend from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] says that he has conversed with somebody in Cincinnati who has been concerned in forty-four bankrupt cases, and has got no dividend in any. Did my friend's friend tell him whether the debtors had been discharged or not?

Mr. MORTON. That was a general statement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He did not tell him whether the debtor in any of these cases had been discharged. He could not have got his discharge unless he had the assent of a majority of his creditors in number and amount. Now, I have heard of forty-four bankrupts and a great many more, both in England and here, and in France, and in Belgium, and in Holland, and wherever there are civilized countries and civilized proceedings for regulating the rights of debtors and creditors, who did not happen to have any assets when they began. You can find all over the Southern States, where very likely the Cincinnati man traded, a people who had been ruined by the war, and who had taken advantage of this bankrupt law to be able to start upon their feet again as freemen, as the slaves did from another kind of slavery. So it appears to me it does not prove much to say, unless we know something of the particular circumstances, that in forty-four cases a particular merchant in Cincinnati got no dividend, and particularly when you do not know but that he himself assented to the discharge of the debtor in every one of those forty-four instances. That does not prove anything at all.

Now, let us come to the spirit of this amendment itself. Why, Mr. President, the object of a bankrupt law, as I stated before, is not the seizure of a man's property by one creditor, as is done under the appraisal laws of the State of Indiana, and of Ohio, perhaps, to satisfy a debt by hard grasping of the law to the exclusion of every other creditor; but it is almost perfectly analogous to the disposition of the property of a deceased person. May I ask my friend if the laws of Indiana provide that the property of deceased persons shall not be sold to settle their estates except on an appraisal?

Mr. THURMAN. The law requires an appraisal in Ohio of all real estate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am asking my friend from Indiana.

Mr. PRATT. It does, so far as real estate is concerned.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well. Then my friends find in the analogous laws of their own States that there is no occasion for appraising personal property. Now, when you come to real estate, as I said before, the object of a bankrupt bill, be it good or bad, if you are to have one at all, the best kind possible is that according to the wishes of the creditors, when a man must have his property divided among his creditors, the property is to be disposed of at the earliest moment. They all have notice of the fact that the property is to be disposed of; and when we provide, as the amendment of the committee provides, that the judge may order it to be sold in parcels, ever so small, if you have a set of creditors who are desirous of protecting their interests, all they have to do to prevent property from being sold for 25 per cent. of its value is to attend and bid. They can protect their interests in that way against any possible collusion on the part of the assignee and any person to whom he may sell it, for the reason that they can bid the property up to what they think is the price at which they would take it and divide it up among themselves.

But then there is another answer; and I must beg pardon again for taking so much time with this point, although it is really of more importance, I think, than it seems at first view. The court by the provision already reported, as you will see by reading it, has complete power over these sales, so that the property shall be sold for the largest sum now. If, in any instance, the court thinks a sale ought to be put off, he directs the assignee to adjourn the sale, because the bids do not come in, or because there is not sufficient bidding, or for any reason. If there is a temporary panic or embarrassment in the neighborhood where the real estate lies or the other property lies, any part of it, so far as this power of the court goes, the power of the court is supreme to say, "Pause in making this sale until the favorable moment shall occur, until the right season of the year, the right combination of circumstances."

Now here you propose really to narrow this wholesome and general discretion which operates in every State alike and operates over all State laws alike, by saying that in particular cases in any State it shall in effect be his duty to order an appraisal of all the property, and if the property does not sell at two-thirds of the sum appraised the whole proceeding shall stop, because there is nothing to be done in bankruptcy properly considered but dispose of the assets, and pay over the dividends and wind up the estate. How long is it to stop? How long is it to lie, when perhaps both the debtor and the creditors themselves, all hands, are desirous that all shall get together and have the property disposed of in small parcels in such a way that if it does not bring but a quarter of its apparent price everybody may get his proportionate share and the debtor will be discharged? You cannot administer a bankrupt law in that way; and yet, as I was just saying, the provision we have introduced as a sweeping and generalized one of entire power over these sales would, in my opinion, enable the court, if there should be occasion for it, not to do one particular thing to which he is cramped by such an amendment as this, but to do anything of that nature acccrding to the circumstances of the case. My friend is sufficiently well acquainted with the administration of law and with the making of law to know that if you are to confer a power on a tribunal that is to be supervisory over an executive act, it is much safer for all parties concerned to give him the power which the general language does, and leave him to the methods by which that power is to be put in motion. So that if I wanted an appraisal provision in a case where the judges should think it to be indispensable, I would not limit the general language of this amendment, which has been drawn, I may say, by my friend from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT,] who lives in an appraisal State himself, but would leave it to the judge in the particular case to say, "I will have what is called an upset price, and the sale shall be postponed, if the bidding does not come up to that, until some time when it can." It is not necessary to have an appraisement provision specifically.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT.]

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I could not agree with my friend from Indiana that his amendment was exactly right, and yet I do think the court ought to have it in his power to order an appraisement of real estate in order to assist him in determining the question. The great trouble in the settlement of bankrupt estates is that the creditors themselves, in the general hopelessness of the case, do not look to the conduct of the assignee. The court is the only protection. The court, indeed, is the only protection the creditors can have in the ordinary course of settling bankrupt estates. It seems to me that unless the judge of the court has the power, under the general authority conferred on him to supervise the sale, to order an appraisement so that he may get the benefit of the opinion of disinterested and intelligent freeholders of the county where the land lies, there is no practical supervision of the matter. While I do not want to interfere with the bill and with the amendments that have been carefully considered by the committee, it occurs to me that some such proposition as this ought to be inserted, to guard the estate and to guard the property and the interests of all concerned: "That the court may at any time order an appraisement to be made of the real estate of the bankrupt, in whole or in part, to be made by three reputable freeholders of the county in which it is situated."

A proposition like this could not create much delay or much expense. In Ohio our law requires all real estate to be appraised, and it must be sold for two-thirds of the appraisement. I would not require that in a bankrupt estate. But suppose it should appear that, in a remote county, land about which the judge could not possibly know anything, was sold for one-tenth of its appraised value. That of itself would be apparent evidence of fraud, or want of care, or want of notice, or of neglect of some kind. It does seem to me that some such amendment as this ought to be adopted; and I offer it to come in at the beginning of section 2, and then all that is now in the section may properly come in after the words I propose to insert.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to ask my colleague if he heard the remark made by the chairman of the committee, which is strictly correct, as to the effect of this provision in this section, lines 5, 6, 7, and 8:

> And the court, on the application of any party in interest, shall have complete supervisory power over such sales, so that the property sold shall realize the largest sum.

That is a grant of authority in the largest and most unlimited terms possible; and there can be no question that the court making an order in respect to the sale of any property, real or personal, under that clause, may in the order name an upset price.

Mr. SHERMAN. If that can be done under that clause, very well, though I have read it very carefully, and do not see that it covers that; but if it does, my answer is that the creditors are not watching the proceedings in the settlement of bankrupts' estates. These sales are made from time to time, often in remote parts of the country. In my own State, how is it possible for a resident in one county to know what is the value of land in a remote county? The court cannot know it. It is not in the nature of things that he shall know it. But it seems to me there ought to be with the files of the case information showing the fair value of all the real estate. You cannot take it as to personal property, because that is in some respects evanescent, and it is very difficult to appraise it; but as to real estate to be sold, it seems to me there ought always to be an inventory made by some disinterested party.

My colleague thinks that, under this general clause giving the court supervisory power over the sale, the judge can fix the minimum price without having the benefit of an appraisal; but it seems to me that he infers an amount of wisdom in the court that does not appertain to judges who have no knowledge of the facts.

Mr. THURMAN. I have not the slightest doubt in the world that the judge may name an upset price under that provision; and he will inform himself by testimony of what would be a fair upset price and the best under all the circumstances to adopt. A remark made by my colleague, as to an appraisement, has struck me all the time in regard to the bankrupt law, that it would have been a wise thing if the law had provided, as our State law does in regard to a decedent's estate, that an inventory with an appraisement of the entire estate should be filed. We do require under the bankrupt act an inventory of the bankrupt's property, but we do not require, as in Ohio, in respect to a decedent's estate, that an appraisement of the entire property, real and personal, shall be made. That is the first step in the settlement of a decedent's estate in Ohio. It is for the administrator to make an inventory of the estate, and then have the entire estate, real and personal, appraised; and then that appraisement, with the inventory, is returned to the probate court. If an appraisement of all the bankrupt's estate could be made and filed in the court in the very first instance, I do not know but that it would be a very beneficial thing; but I would not clog this sales section with a provision of that kind.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can only state that my amendment is drawn so as to require just what my colleague describes, but leaving it discretionary with the court. I propose to commence this section by giving authority to the judge to order an appraisement of real estate, and then follow as a matter of course the provisions about the sale of the property, which are not at all clogged by the previous clause, because there is no provision by which the property must be sold at two-thirds of the appraisement. That perhaps might too long delay the settlement of the bankrupt estate; but that appraisement always on file would instruct the judge, and instruct the parties in interest, that their rights were being sacrificed by a sale which was unduly under the appraisement.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The debtor himself in giving his account of assets gives a sworn statement of the value of all his property, and the judge has that to inform his mind in reference to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is only in cases of voluntary bankruptcy.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; in all cases. There is a provision here that the bankrupt may be called and sworn in involuntary bankruptcy as well as in voluntary proceedings.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is he bound in all cases to give an inventory and valuation of the property? He is bound to give an inventory, but not an estimate, of the valuation of the property, as I understand.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. He is bound to give an inventory, and he is subject to examination.

Mr. BOREMAN. It seems to me that this amendment is impracticable and will effect no good. The court certainly has the power proposed to be conferred under this bill as it stands, ample power to ascertain the value of any property, and whether it is being sold for less than its value or not. Courts exercise that control over all sales that take place under their orders and decrees. This is not made obligatory. If this was an amendment requiring an appraisement in all cases, then it seems to me it would amount to something; but under this amendment an appraisement will not take place unless some exception is made to the proceeding, unless there is some charge of unfairness, something done to induce the sale of the property for less than its value. Whenever interest enough is manifested in the sale by the creditors or the debtor to watch it closely, see that the property is not being sacrificed, then they can, under this bill as it stands, in my judgment, have the judgment of the court upon it. They can take affidavits, bring witnesses into court, or anything of that sort, in order to ascertain the value of the property; or the court might appoint persons to look at it, no doubt, and make an appraisement. I think the general power here covers the case; so that unless it is made universal, to apply to every case, the amendment will amount to nothing, as it seems to me. It is merely permissive that the court may do so, but it is not obliged to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.]

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the section.

Mr. PRATT. I offer another amendment, to come in at the same place, after the word "sum," in the eighth line of the section:

> May order an appraisement to be made of the real estate of the debtor, and require that such property shall upon sale bring at least one-half of the appraised value, said appraisement to be made by two disinterested freeholders, one to be selected by the debtor and the other by the assignee, with power on their part, in case of disagreement, to select a third party, whose decision shall be final.

Mr. THURMAN. Suppose the very cause of bankruptcy is that the debtor has run off to parts unknown?

Mr. PRATT. Then I suppose any agent on his part would do.

Mr. THURMAN. Suppose he has left no agent?

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, I wish in this connection, before the sense of the Senate is taken on this amendment, to reply to one or two suggestions made by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] He suggests that in these appraisals the danger is that the property will be appraised so high that it will not command two-thirds or one-half the appraised value. He obviously has reference to a state of things which we both understand in the western country, where the debtor is anxious to postpone the day of payment as long as possible, and selects on his part some friend who puts an extravagant value upon the property. The debtor there has a motive of course for having his property appraised at the highest possible value, so as to prevent a sale. But that principle has no application here, because the debtor's property in this case is gone anyhow. There is nothing from the proceeds that is to return to him. Hence he has no motive to procure an extravagant appraisement of his property. On the other hand, it does, as I said before, secure the creditors some protection against absolute loss. The observations that I have heard here this afternoon in respect to these assignees' sales are well deserved; they are true; they are founded in fact; and I wish to throw an additional guard by this amendment around the debtor's property, so that it shall not be absolutely sacrificed.

Why, Mr. President, we had a report laid on our desks last week, made by the Attorney-General in answer to a call made upon him as to the amount of the costs and expenses of those who were connected with the administration of the bankrupt law, and, if my memory serves me aright, the costs of the officers, of the assignees and registers, and marshals, and clerks amounted to somewhere in the neighborhood of five or six million dollars during the brief period that this bankrupt law has been in force. In other words, that much of the estates of debtors had been absolutely absorbed by these officers, instead of going into the hands of the creditors. They had been "gobbled up," as the saying is, by these officers, constituted by the bankrupt law. I want to prevent, if I can, by this amendment, such a state of things in the future.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not propose to go over this ground again, but just to call the attention of the Senator to the actual state of the law, and to show him, if I can, that he could get at this matter very much better by amending some other part of this law.

When proceedings in bankruptcy are commenced, and they have arrived at that stage when the property of the bankrupt is to be seized, the law requires that a warrant shall be issued to the marshal, which directs him to take possession of the property of the bankrupt, and also to make publication and serve notice upon the creditors, the same as in a case of voluntary bankruptcy. Under this warrant it is his duty to take possession of the property of the bankrupt, and to prepare, within three days from the time of taking such possession, a complete inventory of all the property, and to return it as soon as completed. That the marshal is required to do. But the law does not stop at that. When the debtor is adjudicated to be a bankrupt the law requires as follows:

> The order of adjudication of bankruptcy shall require the bankrupt forthwith, or within such number of days not exceeding five after the date of the orders or notice thereof, as shall by the order be prescribed, to make and deliver, or transmit by mail, post-paid, to the messenger, a schedule of the creditors and an inventory of his estate in the form and verified in the manner required of a petitioning debtor by section 11.

There, then, are two inventories of the estate, one made by the marshal, and the other made by the debtor under his oath, and both filed in court; and that is before any sale whatsoever can take place. Now, if any estimate of values was to be made, one would say that the simplest thing that could be done would be to require that one or other of these persons returning one or the other of these inventories should affix the value of the property in his estimation, as well as the items of the property, and then you would have something like an administrator's inventory, as it now is made out in the States which require an inventory, with a sworn valuation of the property. Then it would be within the discretion of the court to say whether or not the property should be sold for the sum specified in that inventory as its value, or for some proportion of that sum. But to clog this particular section in reference to sales by such a provision as is suggested by the Senator from Indiana, I submit once more, is to do what there is no necessity for, because as the section now stands the court can name an upset price, either as to personal or real estate, and what would tend inevitably to produce great delay in the administration of the estate.

Mr. CROZIER. It seems to me that the section, as reported by the committee, substantially covers the ground that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana does. It provides—

> And the court, on the application of any party in interest—

That would include any creditor, or the debtor himself—> shall have complete supervisory power over such sales, so that the property sold shall realize the largest sum.

If, under such a provision, a sale were ordered and held, and nobody complained of it, neither the creditor nor the debtor, it seems to me the sale ought to be permitted to stand. If either of them does complain of it, or if both complain, all they have to do is to present the facts connected with the sale to the court, and if the court is of opinion that it has been so held as not to realize the largest sum, the court has ample power, as every one will admit, to set aside that sale and direct another sale to be made; and so it may go on time after time until the property has been sold so as to realize the largest sum.

If it is supposed that the sale took place under such circumstances; that there were very few bidders there from want of notice or other cause; that the property was not bid up to its real value; that it was struck off at less than its real value, the sworn testimony of three or four or five, or any number of freeholders or others residing in the neighborhood being produced to the court, it seems to me any judge who is fit to sit on the bench would regard it and set aside the sale, which I have no doubt he has power to do under the section as it stands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. PRATT.]

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the section.

Mr. PRATT. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary whether an amendment is not necessary in line 15 of this same section to this effect: "and upon sale made pursuant to such order there shall be no right of redemption." The sale contemplated here is a judicial sale, because at the commencement of that paragraph the section says, "And the court may in its discretion order any real estate, or any portion thereof, to be sold for one-fourth cash in hand," &c. Under the laws in some of the States that property upon being sold would be subject to the redemption law, so that it might be redeemed at any time by the debtor within the period of one year. I suggest whether an amendment of this kind would not be necessary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I submit to my friend that it is not, because this sale is under the paramount authority of the law of the United States, which regulates its own terms; and the State law of redemption has nothing to do with the question.

The second section was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next section will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 3. That the following words shall be added to section 26 of said act: That in all causes and trials arising or ordered under this act, the alleged bankrupt, and any party thereto, shall be a competent witness.

The section was agreed to.

The next section was read, as follows:

> SEC. 4. That in cases of compulsory or involuntary bankruptcy, the provisions of said act, and any amendment thereof, or of any supplement thereto, requiring the payment of any proportion of the debts of the bankrupt, or the assent of any portion of his creditors, as a condition of his discharge from his debts, shall not apply; but he may, if otherwise entitled thereto, be discharged by the court in the same manner and with the same effect as if he had paid such per cent. of his debts, or as if the required proportion of his creditors had assented thereto.
> And in cases of voluntary bankruptcy, no discharge shall be granted to a debtor whose assets shall not be equal to 33 per cent. of the claims proved against his estate, upon which he shall be liable as principal debtor, without the assent of his creditors, in number and value as prescribed by existing law; and the provision in section 33 of said act of March 2, 1867, requiring 50 per cent. of such assets, is hereby repealed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the section just read.

Mr. CONKLING. I was in the act of calling the attention of the Senator from Vermont privately to a consideration which would be lost lest I interpose now, as the Chair is about to put the question. It seems to me that these clauses taken together involve unnecessary repetition and prolixity. The section will stand, first, "in cases of compulsory or involuntary bankruptcy, the provisions of said act, and any amendment thereof, or of any supplement thereto, requiring," and so on, "shall not apply," and then it proceeds under the last amendment offered, which is, in addition, to make provision that they shall apply, except that the percentage is reduced.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The last clause is as to voluntary bankruptcy.

Mr. CONKLING. I understand that, and my suggestion is only one of form and brevity and convenience. I suggest to the Senator from Vermont that the same thing would be attained if he would let this lie over for the moment, by redrawing the section so as to put these two ideas together, and abbreviate it very much. If, however, the Senator from Vermont has considered it, there may be some reason for its being as it is, and I do not insist on my suggestion; but it struck me, as I read the amendment as originally proposed, and then the added amendment, that having been drawn at different times, they did not coincide as well as they might be made to for the purpose of brevity and simplicity.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The difficulty that I had in drawing this last clause according to the vote of the committee was that I did not wish to disturb the amendment that we had first reported to the Senate, and which disposed of that branch of the question as to compulsory bankruptcy by itself; and then, when I came to provide for the case of voluntary bankruptcy, I confess that I had not sufficient wit to provide out of my own consciousness—as I believe the expression of my friend sometimes is—any better way of stating it as to the voluntary bankrupt, so as to keep clear the distinction between the two classes, than to restate the language of the original bill. After the word "bankruptcy," in line 1, I restate the provisions of the original bill, using 33 per cent. instead of 50, until you get down to the assent of his creditors in number and value, and then repeal the provision of the thirty-third section of the act of 1867 requiring 50 per cent. in that particular case. I did not see any better way of stating it so that it would be perfectly intelligible than the one I used. If my friend, when the bill comes into the Senate, will be kind enough to frame a section which he thinks will embody the two ideas more compactly, I shall certainly be very much obliged to him.

Mr. CONKLING. I presume, after the statement of the Senator, it is well to leave this as it is, although if he had not said that he had considered it and tried to draw the section with more brevity, I would suggest to him that the fewest words which would amend the existing law so as to substitute 33 per cent. for 50 per cent., and make the other change, would work the whole purpose; but I withdraw my suggestion because the Senator says he has considered it and thinks this is the better way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If no other amendment be offered, the question will be on agreeing to the section.

The section was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 5. That in cases of involuntary or compulsory bankruptcy, the period of four months mentioned in section 35 of the act to which this is an amendment is hereby changed to two months; but this provision shall not take effect until two months after the passage of this act. And in the cases aforesaid, the period of six months mentioned in said section 35 is hereby changed to three months; but this provision shall not take effect until three months after the passage of this act.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Senator from Vermont why it is provided that that section shall not take effect until two months from the passage of the act? Why not let it take effect from the passage of this act?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The reason of that is so that this shall not be retroactive and validate what would otherwise be fraudulent conveyances in the gap of two months, when we reduce the period of time; and it is exactly the same principle as that which was adopted when the bankrupt bill itself was passed. While it took effect as to its passage, no proceeding was to be taken under it until a certain length of time, and yet the provisions against fraudulent conveyances, &c., retroacted from the time when proceedings might be taken to the 2d of March, when the bill took effect. Now the law provides, if there be a fraudulent conveyance, that is to say, fraudulent preference of one creditor against all the rest by a bankrupt, and bankruptcy occurs within four months thereafter, that preference shall be void, and the creditor shall give up to the estate the property he got. If we now fix that time at two months, and have it take effect instantly, then all that kind of preferences that occurred not less than two months and not more than four months ago will go scot-free.

The section was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 6. That section 35 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows:
First. After the word "and," in line 11, insert the word "knowing."
Secondly. After the word "attachment," in the same line, insert the words "sequestration, seizure."
Thirdly. After the word "and," in line 20, insert the word "knowing."

The section was agreed to.

The next section was read, as follows:

SEC. 7. That section 39 of said act of March 2, 1867, be amended so as to read as follows:

SEC. 39. That any person residing, and owing debts, as aforesaid, who, after the passage of this act, shall depart from the State, District, or Territory of which he is an inhabitant, with intent to defraud his creditors; or, being absent, shall, with such intent, remain absent; or shall conceal himself to avoid the service of legal process in any action for the recovery of a debt or demand provable under this act; or shall conceal or remove any of his property to avoid its being attached, taken, or sequestered on legal process; or shall make any assignment, gift, sale, conveyance, or transfer of his estate, property, rights, or credits, either within the United States or elsewhere, with intent to delay, defraud, or hinder his creditors; or who has been arrested and held in custody under or by virtue of mesne process or execution, issued out of any court of any State, District, or Territory within which such debtor resides or has property, founded upon a demand in its nature provable against a bankrupt's estate under this act, and for a sum exceeding $100, and such process is remaining in force and not discharged by payment, or in any other manner provided by the law of such State, District, or Territory, applicable thereto, for a period of twenty days; or has been actually imprisoned for more than twenty days in a civil action founded on contract for the sum of $100 or upward; or who, being bankrupt or insolvent, or in contemplation of bankruptcy or insolvency, shall make any payment, gift, grant, sale, conveyance, or transfer of money or other property, estate, rights, or credits, or confess judgment, or give any warrant to confess judgment, or procure his property to be taken on legal process, with intent to give a preference to one or more of his creditors or to any person or persons who are or may be liable for him as indorsers, bail, sureties, or otherwise, or with the intent, by such disposition of his property, to defeat or delay the operation of this act; or who, being a banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer, or miner, has fraudulently stopped payment, or who has stopped or suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of forty days, shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy, and, subject to the conditions hereinafter prescribed, shall be adjudged a bankrupt on the petition of one or more of his creditors, who shall constitute one-fourth thereof, at least, in number, and the aggregate of whose debts provable under this act amounts to at least one-third of the debts so provable: Provided, That such petition is brought within six months after such act of bankruptcy shall have been committed. And the provisions of this section shall apply to all cases of compulsory or involuntary bankruptcy commenced since the ——, 1873, as well as to those commenced hereafter. And in all cases commenced since said ——, 1873, and prior to the passage of this act, as well as those commenced hereafter, the court shall, if such allegation as to the number or amount of petitioning creditors be denied by the debtor by a statement in writing to that effect, require him to file in court forthwith a full list of his creditors, with their places of residence and the sums due them, respectively, and shall ascertain, upon reasonable notice to the creditors, whether one-fourth in number and one-third in amount thereof, as aforesaid, have petitioned that the debtor be adjudged a bankrupt.

But if such debtor shall, on the filing of the petition, admit in writing that the requisite number and amount of creditors have petitioned, the court shall so adjudge, which judgment shall be final, and the matter proceed without further steps on that subject. And if it shall appear that such number and amount have not so petitioned, the court shall grant reasonable time, not exceeding, in cases heretofore commenced, twenty days, and, in cases hereafter commenced, ten days, within which other creditors may join in such petition. And if, at the expiration of such time so limited, the number and amount shall comply with the requirements of this section, the matter of bankruptcy may proceed; but if, at the expiration of such limited time, such number and amount shall not answer the requirements of this section, the proceedings shall be dismissed, and, in cases hereafter commenced, with costs. And if such person shall be adjudged a bankrupt, the assignee may recover back the money or property so paid, conveyed, sold, assigned, or transferred contrary to this act: Provided, That the person receiving such payment or conveyance had reasonable cause to believe that the debtor was insolvent, and knew that a fraud on this act was intended; and such person, if a creditor, shall not, in cases of actual fraud on his part, be allowed to prove for more than moiety of his debt; and this limitation on the proof of debts shall apply to cases of voluntary as well as involuntary bankruptcy. And the petition of creditors under this section may be sufficiently verified by the oaths of the first five signers thereof, if so many there be.

And if any of said first five signers shall not reside in the district in which such petition is to be filed, the same may be signed and verified by the oath or oaths of the attorney or attorneys, agent or agents, of such signers. And in computing the number of creditors as aforesaid, who shall join in such petition, creditors whose respective debts do not exceed $250 shall not be reckoned. But if there be no creditors whose debts exceed said sum of $250, or if the requisite number of creditors holding debts exceeding $250 fail to sign the petition, the creditors having debts of a less amount shall be reckoned for the purposes aforesaid.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the phraseology in the fortieth line of this section. After enumerating a great number of persons who may be forced into bankruptcy under this section, it provides—

Or who has stopped or suspended, and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of forty days, shall be deemed to have committed an act of bankruptcy.

I wish to know, in the first place, whether it is sufficiently clear from this phraseology that this clause is confined to bankers, brokers, merchants, traders, manufacturers, and miners?

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is not the slightest doubt of it, because, with the exception that, where the word "fourteen" occurs in the old law the word "forty" is used, the provision to which my friend is speaking is the precise language of the old law, in respect to which there never was any doubt or dispute. This suspension of commercial paper applies only to the banker, the broker, the merchant, the trader, the manufacturer, and the miner, and to nobody else.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the very point to which I wished to call the attention of my friend. In the first place, if you read this language, it is a mere question of punctuation. If, at the end of the words "fraudulently stopped payment," instead of a comma there was a semicolon, there would be no doubt, I think, that the language would be broad enough to cover a lawyer or any other person. This language is copied from an amendment to the bankrupt act. This language of the bankrupt act, which is now before me, is different.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is mistaken. It is copied from the original act, but putting in the two additional classes of people that are mentioned in the act of 1870 or 1871.

Mr. SHERMAN. At all events it is a simple question of punctuation. Now, there were difficulties under one of the amendments of the bankrupt act upon this very point as to whether or not this last clause refers to bankers, brokers, merchants, and traders. I have it not before me, and I am not familiar enough with the particular law, but perhaps the Senator can refer to it. The Senator will see that this clause in lines 38 and 39 is complete and perfect in itself, ending with the words "stopped payment." After enumerating a great number of persons who shall do so and so, or who shall have done so and so, it reads in this way:

Or who, being a banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer, or miner, has fraudulently stopped payment.

That is complete and perfect in itself, and it is confined to a particular class of persons; but then it goes on:

Or who has stopped or suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of forty days.

There is nothing there which precludes the idea that that particular clause in relation to the non-payment for forty days of commercial paper may not apply to all other persons. As a matter of course, this may be hypercritical; but I think it ought to be placed beyond all question. It ought to be confined to those persons who are engaged in commercial pursuits. There is nothing here to indicate the construction which my friend puts upon it except the mode of punctuation, and except the inference that may be drawn from the words "commercial paper." I think that ought to be made clear.

Mr. BOREMAN. It might be done by striking out the word "who."

Mr. SHERMAN. No; that word is necessary there.

But I wish to call attention to another thing. I think there ought to be in this clause some provision such as I mentioned awhile ago limiting the operation of the clause to cases where the aggregate debts exceed two or three thousand dollars. As a matter of course, where a person has committed an act of fraud, such as is recited in the previous clauses of this section, I do not care whether it is in regard to five dollars, or five hundred dollars, or five thousand dollars; I would not limit by amount any remedy that may be pressed against him; but where it is the simple non-payment of a debt, a simple act of misfortune which may happen not only to the class of persons named but to others, I would not allow the enginery of involuntary bankruptcy to be put in force against a person who is simply guilty of a misfortune. Any of these persons, a banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer, or miner, may be temporarily embarrassed so that he cannot pay his paper for forty days, or for three months, or even for six months; and it seems to me he ought not to be forced into involuntary bankruptcy unless he has committed some act which is wrong in a moral sense, and all the other acts previously named are acts which imply some moral turpitude or involve some immorality, or some attempt to deceive, to defraud, or to cheat. But here you are dealing with a class of people who are simply unfortunate. I have no objection to a bankrupt law that will compel a man when he is unable to pay his debts, even from misfortune, to come in and make a fair distribution of his assets among his creditors. But this is a matter simply in our discretion. This clause applies only to persons who have been guilty of no wrong, no fraud, no misconduct; who are simply unable to pay their commercial paper at the end of forty days.

Sir, I think these proceedings ought not to be started against a man unless the amount involved is sufficient to justify it. I would be willing to fix it at $5,000. Indeed, I would not care if this whole clause were repealed, and where the amount involved is not $5,000, where a man is struggling along in debt to the amount of $5,000, even if he has got but $2,500, and he is trying to pay his debts, and the creditors cannot urge against him any fraudulent act, any attempt to cheat or mislead, or to give preferences, or to delay or hinder, it seems to me it would be better to leave the settlement of his property and of his affairs to the ordinary laws of the State. It is true that he ought to have the power, in order to protect himself against the oppression of a creditor, to step forward and apply for the benefits of the voluntary bankrupt clause.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then he has got to pay 33 per cent. at least.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well. We all know in our daily life of persons who are struggling along in this way, small dealers who, even if they are insolvent and have not got means enough to pay, everybody believes to be honest; no man alleges against them any fraudulent act, any act of misconduct, any act of favoritism. Now, if a creditor does really seek to oppress them and to get the advantage in the disposition of their estates, I see no objection to allowing them to come forward and claim the benefit of the bankrupt law for the advantage of all their creditors; but why should the Congress of the United States step in and give to one-fourth of the creditors—as it is now under the law much better than it was under the old system—the power to prevent such a man from struggling along and getting out of his difficulties, if possible?

I hope my friend from Vermont will not think that I am pressing a matter that does not occur, because it does occur in every State, in every community. I desire to see this bankrupt law confined in its involuntary feature to traders of a sufficient character to have the name of merchants and also to people whose debts amount to $5,000 or upward. I would not call into play the enginery of the bankrupt law against a man who was struggling along with a small indebtedness, with a disposition to go on and pay his debts, against whom no allegation is made of dishonesty, or fraud, or peculation, or any of the causes recited in the previous part of this section. Therefore I will move an amendment. Perhaps my colleague suggests the best place to insert it, but it strikes me the better place would be between lines 39 and 40, on page 7, to insert "being indebted in the sum of over $3,000." I would prefer to say $5,000, but I will say "indebted in the sum of over $3,000;" so that the creditors who are seeking to force such a man to be an involuntary bankrupt must be able to say, "This man owes $3,000." I do not see any objection to that.

Then I think forty days is rather too short a period, especially when you are dealing with men who are entirely innocent of fraud. I have no objection to forcing a man into bankruptcy when he is doing anything wrong; but we are now in this clause dealing with people who are not doing anything wrong, unless misfortune is a wrong. It seems to me that the non-payment of commercial paper for a short period of time, for forty days, by a broker, banker, merchant, trader, or manufacturer, who may be struggling along, against whom there are no charges of fraud, should not be a ground of forcing him into involuntary bankruptcy by one-fourth of his creditors. It strikes me it would be better for the Government of the United States to give even six months in such a case, until the debtor shall have committed some act of wrong, and then I should have no objection to allowing the law to be enforced against him. But the first amendment, which would relieve a great many people of moderate means from the fear of the bankrupt law, I think ought to be adopted.

Having made these remarks I submit the amendment to the Senate. I know how difficult it is to propose amendments to a bill of this kind, that has been carefully considered by an able committee, and I desire rather to appeal to them to make this provision, if they can see their way clear to do so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I appreciate entirely the sincerity of my friend from Ohio, and I see the force of all that he says, looked at from the point of view that he has taken; but I think he has fallen into what I styled without having any right to style it so, when I opened this subject this morning, the error of our being able by any possibility to provide security for any one class, be it debtor or creditor, but that we had to look at three things at the same moment of time in order to make the law right. We must look at the creditor's interest, his just interest and his just right; we must look at the debtor's interest, his just interest and his just duty; we must look at the interest of the community, which it is true in the State and in the nation is exactly the same, and that is that justice should be tempered with humanity, but that equality and honesty should be made to prevail as far as law can make it go.

Now, then, looking at it from the broad point of view that I ask my friend's attention to, what would be the effect if we were to provide that this clause of compulsory bankruptcy of traders, &c., should only apply to people who owed debts of $5,000 or upward? The effect is that we leave out of the provisions of a compulsory bankrupt law, so far as creditors are concerned, all those below, which would be a very large percentage of all the traders, and bankers, and miners, and brokers, and merchants in the country, perhaps a fourth. That would be a large proportion, but I do not think it would be much less than that. Now, what would be the effect? The rights of that body of people, so far as the rights of creditors are concerned among themselves, that is, the right that all the creditors have who have aided the estate of the bankrupt by selling him property and dealing with him, to have when he fails, just as when he dies, a fair division of what there is left, is put entirely at naught. You remand those gentlemen to State laws. You cannot prevent them from oppressing the debtor. You cannot keep their hands off him by providing in this law that they shall not force him into bankruptcy; but you turn them over to the still more savage rule of the law of each of the States, (and of course I do not use the word "savage" in any sense of reflecting upon the legislation of the States,) because they have no right to make a law which impairs the obligation of the contract, and that is, the duty of the debtor to pay at the day fixed. The Constitution declares that they shall not be so. Very well, then. By the laws of each State, every man whom you leave out from this compulsory clause is the victim of the will of any one creditor, not the creature of the will of one-fourth of his creditors, at least as this bankrupt law provides; but you turn him over, looking at it now only in the point of view of interest of the creditor class, to the rapacity and the self-interest which, in the case of rapacity, leads the creditor to say, "I will grasp under the State law all that this man has got, if the State law allows that by process of law; I will sue him to-day, and if he is honest he cannot defend himself, and I will get judgment next week, or next month, whatever the time is; then my judgment becomes a preferred lien; in the Eastern States, where the laws of attachment prevail, I will sue him to-day, and get a preference over all his other creditors, and will take the whole of his estate for my benefit, although I have only contributed a tenth of what there is left, and I will cheat all the other creditors, in a moral sense, out of every cent that they have contributed."

What becomes of the poor debtor in the mean time? History repeats itself century after century. The poor debtor in the meanwhile in old times went to jail in England, went to jail in the States of the United States; and in later and better times he finds himself eaten up by innumerable suits; those who sue first get something; those who sue last get nothing and foot the bills of costs, and the debtor goes out into the world again with a millstone around his neck, every dollar of his property swept from him; nobody is paid, and the moment he undertakes to begin again, they repeat the same process, because he is not discharged by any bankrupt law. There he is, a waif, an outcast, and a wanderer. That is the effect of it so far as the creditor is concerned.

But how is it so far as the debtor is concerned? He sees this series of impending ills over him, that he is at every one man's mercy instead of being protected for a certain period of time, forty days by this law; he sees himself at the mercy, during those forty days, of every one of his creditors. The honest creditor is compelled to sue him and break him down, although he would wish to have him go on; because he is obliged to say to himself, as the truth would be, "If I do not sue this man and get a judgment against him, and take his property, somebody else will; the whole body of creditors may not be so tender-hearted as I am; I have no security that B to-morrow will not take this property if I do not take it to-day." Therefore, as it is called, the race of diligence—what I should call the race of injustice and inequality—is set on foot by every one of his creditors; and instead of the debtor being broken up by bankruptcy at the end of forty days, he is broken up by all the laws which compel in the States the payment of debts when they are dishonored for a day, or the day after they are due.

Now, what is a man put in that position tempted to do? He is tempted to do what we have seen in all the States, too much. He is tempted to say, "Here is my brother, of whom I have borrowed money, let me pay him in full; here is my friend, who has been kind to me in my youth, let me pay him in full, disregarding what I may have borrowed from my bank or my neighbor of yesterday." In other words, if you put me outside of the bankrupt law, I am left by the law exposed to oppression on one side, and tempted to fraud and unfairness on the other. That is the effect, when you look at this on all sides, upon the man who, you say, because he does not owe $5,000, shall not stand under the condemnation of this thirty-ninth section.

I submit, in all seriousness, to my honorable friend—and the committee have studied it a good deal—that it is one of the beneficent features of this section that the distance of time and the simple quantum of amount provided in this section (short in the case of time, although longer than it was before) are for the benefit, the real benefit, not only of the oppressed debtor, but of every creditor who desires that the debtor, if able, shall go on, and if he cannot, that there shall be a fair division of his estate.

Then the law goes on to provide as you see, Mr. President, that if when the time of hearing comes after these forty days the debtor shows he has paid up the dishonored paper, that he has made arrangements to go on, the proceeding is dropped; nobody is harmed. But if you were to extend the period of forty days to a greater length of time than that, then you would have come into the position that it would be possible in many of the States—I might almost say in most of them, unless the honest debtor interposed a dishonest defense, putting in an objectionable plea, or a defense where he knew he had none—there would be time given to the creditors to obtain preferences by what are called the grab-laws; by the race of diligence, as it is sometimes called. The whole spirit which prevails in commercial transactions, the whole spirit that in every State, I think I am safe in saying, in actions of debt, prevails in the distribution of assets—that of equality—is entirely destroyed, and you have made a victim not only of the debtor, but you have made a victim of the body of his honest creditors. Therefore we have extended this time to forty days, to give the debtor as much time as possible, and still to keep it so short as to prevent creditors from getting judgments and liens that would hold against him before the body of the creditors could proceed.

I submit, then, to my friend that, looking at it upon all sides, and with the study that the committee have given it, we felt ourselves, I think unanimously, compelled to take the ground that the chief security to all parties, and so for the interest of the State in the promotion of the interest of all parties, was to limit this time to forty days, and to make no limit except the small one which existed originally, if any, to the amount of the debt. It was tried, I may tell my friend, in the act of 1800. There, I think, it was $1,000 or so, and it was found that that species of limitation was harmful rather than useful.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. President, I do not know that I ought to say anything on this subject. If I were to consult alone the amount of knowledge I have upon it I certainly would not. The subject of a bankrupt law has been one of discussion in this country for many years, and there is to-day, I think I may truthfully say, no well-defined universal public sentiment upon it. It was provided for in the Constitution; and as we are in the habit of saying that almost everything that can be found in that sacred instrument is wise, we also say it is wise to provide for a general bankrupt law.

I have to meet this subject here by voting for a bankrupt bill or voting against it. If I were left free to consult my own views upon it, I would not vote for the unconditional repeal of the present bankrupt law. I would be glad to see a system of general bankruptcy, or a law of a general nature covering that subject, passed and remain upon the statute-books of the nation long enough for all the people of the country to become accustomed to it. I say I am not free, because my understanding is, and it is the understanding of my honorable colleague also, that the Legislature of our State passed joint resolutions instructing us to vote for its repeal. He informs me this morning that he has received nothing from the Legislature in a formal manner, as I am sure I have not, of such action there. We have both seen in the public press of the country that such proceedings were taken by the Illinois Legislature. It is fair to presume, perhaps, that such a resolution has passed that body instructing their Senators to vote for the repeal of the bankrupt law. If I could venture to express a preference upon that subject, it would be that such instructions had not passed our Legislature; but as I am uncommitted upon the subject, and have no special feeling about it, when I shall become satisfied that such a joint resolution has passed our Legislature I will respect it and obey it.

Now, then, we are trying to amend the bankrupt law so as to make it acceptable to the people of the country. I would have been glad if after the diligent and long-continued and laborious efforts of the Committee on the Judiciary upon this subject they could have presented a bill here in the shape of a general act that would have met almost universal favor West as well as East. That, perhaps, is impossible; it is certainly difficult to do that. As long as we shall have a credit system in the United States—and I reckon that will be always—my humble opinion is that we should have a national bankrupt law.

To go into the question of the insolvent laws of the various States is too complex; they are difficult to be understood, and they are annoying as applied to the creditor, and injurious to the debtors or the persons who desire to purchase upon credit. To throw us back to the old State system of relying alone upon these insolvent laws I can very clearly see would be quite as injurious to the debtor class, or those desiring to purchase upon credit, almost as the bankrupt law in its present shape. We of the West have great products to sell; we do not have many manufactured articles to sell. We have the products of the soil to sell, and our lot thus far in the Republic has been to purchase almost exclusively, certainly very largely, manufactured articles from the Eastern States and from Europe. We give in exchange for them the produce of the West. We are not always in a condition to pay cash, because we cannot always speedily realize from our productions. In one sense, then, as long as the credit system prevails we shall be debtors, so long as we shall purchase merchandise and manufactured articles from the old countries and from the Eastern States. These are plain facts. There is no use in ignoring them, for they will endure just as long as the credit system endures, and I think that will endure for many years to come, perhaps for centuries.

Now, in order to test the sense of the Senate, if I may venture to go so far, I propose the following amendment, which brings us directly to that question. On page 7, in lines 39, 40, and 41, I move to amend by striking out the words:

> Or who has stopped or suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of forty days.

May we not venture at this session of Congress to pass a bankrupt law which shall reach over every State in the Union, and obtain the consent of all just people everywhere to a bankrupt law upon our statute-books which shall satisfy them that the purposes and objects of such a law are not to favor the creditors to the detriment and injury of the debtor class, but that the object of the legislation is to put upon the statute-books a bankrupt law that is just upon its face and that brings every debtor to account to his creditor where he is guilty or shall be guilty of any fraud in the multiplied and various shapes in which fraud may appear in commercial transactions? Where a man is an absconding debtor, where he flies from justice, where he endeavors to secrete his assets, where he perpetrates or exhibits a disposition to perpetrate any outrage or injustice upon his creditor, the sense of the country would sustain a bankrupt law that would reach him and throw him into bankruptcy. Such a law would meet with universal favor; it would be a national bankrupt law; it would be upon the statute-books of the country, and would gradually accustom the people of the whole nation to the workings and to the justice of a national bankrupt law. We have had two or three, and they have been repealed. If this shall be repealed at this session of Congress, before we can take any steps in that direction again we must begin with a brand-new bankrupt law.

Is it not better, then, to let the present bankrupt law remain upon the statute-books, with proper modifications, and gradually year after year accustom the people of the whole nation to the fact that we have a bankrupt law that is uniform in its action? I think it is better for the whole country that it should remain upon the statute-books and gradually accustom our people to it, so that they will in time learn that a bankrupt law after all is better for the debtor and better for the creditor than our various, complicated, and conflicting State insolvent acts. But I want to get rid of this one clause.

I have listened with great interest and great benefit to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and it is impossible to listen to him without being benefited and instructed upon this subject. I know that this is a technical and delicate part of the subject, but if you can strike out the clause to which I have called attention, which will throw into bankruptcy every trader, every banker, every merchant, who has failed to pay on his paper for a period of fourteen or forty days—if you can exempt that class from the general bankrupt law you will have done much. Just strike out that one clause, two or three lines, and then let us stand upon the general law with these amendments, and we shall have a bankrupt act that will reach around the country, one to which our people will be accustomed, and in time I believe it will meet with universal favor; and once you get a bankrupt law established, once the people become accustomed to it, it may then be amended in the interest of the collection of just debts by more stringent measures than we can venture upon at this time.

If I have made myself understood, I desire to take the sense of the Senate at some time or other, possibly now, as to whether it is willing to strike out those lines which cover that class of cases upon which a man may be thrown into involuntary bankruptcy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask my friend a question? It is, where does he propose to leave these honest debtors who for the period of forty days, being commercial men, have failed to meet their paper? Under what law does he intend to leave them if he strikes out this clause?

Mr. OGLESBY. Unquestionably, if you strike out that portion of this law, you will leave them and leave the creditors to the collection of their debts under the present State insolvent laws; that is clear.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend does not mean merely the present State insolvent laws; he means the present State laws in regard to the collection of debts.

Mr. OGLESBY. I mean that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Including attachments, levies, and preferential deeds?

Mr. OGLESBY. I mean the whole subject; I take it in its broadest sense. As long as we have the credit system, there will be necessity for some legislation on the subject. We are here now interjecting a law between the creditor and the debtor. We are trying to travel along that narrow path that regulates justice between voluntary creditors and voluntary debtors. We are trying to make a settlement of their debts between them, debts that they have contracted by themselves, contracted alone, knowing the resources of the debtor and the time and the ability of the creditor to enforce payment. Although we know that debts were contracted in this way, we are trying to interject between the debtor and the creditor a system for the settlement of their difficulties, or for the collection of the debts. It is an extremely delicate point anyhow; but where a debtor is guilty of fraud, where he is guilty of manifest injustice, where he seeks to delay the collection of a just debt by any perfidy, rascality, villainy, injustice, fraud, or corruption, the public sense of the country would say it is right to overtake that man and bring him to justice; but where a man has purchased from a creditor and has the purchase in his possession, they are trading one with the other, and it is a different thing when we come in to say between those men that if one cannot pay in fourteen days, or cannot pay in forty days, three-fourths of his creditors in amount, or one-fourth in number, may throw him into compulsory bankruptcy. There is some delicacy about that question; it is an intricate and troublesome question. If we could get a bankrupt law and leave that material, I will call it, aspect of it out, I believe we would then inaugurate a system in regard to national bankruptcy that would give us a start, and place it upon a basis where it would endure for centuries.

I did not intend to say half as much as I have said. I offer the amendment for what it is worth.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 7, lines 39, 40, and 41, it is proposed to strike out after the word "payment" the following words:

Or who has stopped or suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of forty days.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, this proposition of my friend from Illinois opens a very wide subject, and yet a subject that is not so very wide after all, looking at it in another aspect. It is, as my friend at my elbow [Mr. THURMAN] has suggested, in its narrowness, striking the word "Hamlet," wherever it occurs, out of the play of Hamlet. The earliest bankrupt laws of the civilized world, beginning even with the Roman laws, before you could say it was civilization as we really understand it, and finding a broader and a wider growth in France and in the Low Countries, all a highly commercial people, applied this very provision that the Senator from Illinois proposes to strike out, the failure to pay commercial paper as a test of bankruptcy.

Mr. THURMAN. Will my friend give way for a moment?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. As my friend from Vermont is going so far back into antiquity, I think he had better take another day, and with his leave I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before putting the question the Chair will, with the assent of the Senate, lay before the Senate a bill from the House of Representatives for reference.

Mr. SHERMAN. I indicated awhile ago a purpose to offer an amendment to the bill, which I desire to offer, so that it may be received and considered as pending. It is an amendment to part of the bill which the Senator from Illinois proposes to strike out, and therefore is properly in order now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask that the following order be made:

Ordered, That the papers relative to the claim of Dr. William Trevitt, former United States consul at Valparaiso, Chili, for salary and clerk hire, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There was, I believe, an adverse report, but a new petition has been presented and referred to the Committee on Commerce, and these papers are necessary to the understanding of the case, so that it does not come within the rule.

The order was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1573) authorizing the Citizens' National Bank of Hagerstown, Maryland, to change its location; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILL.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 223) changing the times for holding certain district courts of the United States for the State of Iowa.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. No. 1573) authorizing the Citizens' National Bank of Hagerstown, Maryland, to change its location—to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. No. 1756) to amend the act entitled "An act to withdraw from settlement and sale a certain section of land in Wyoming Territory," approved May 23, 1872—to the Committee on Public Lands.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 51) in relation to civil-service examinations—to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) explanatory of resolution approved January 31, 1868, entitled "A resolution limiting contracts for stationery and other supplies in the Executive Departments to one year"—to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

AMOS FARLING.

The bill (H. R. No. 1754) to amend the act entitled "An act granting a pension to Amos Farling," approved February 5, 1873, was read twice by its title.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask unanimous consent to put that bill on its passage. The bill granting a pension passed a year ago; and this simply changes the description from "Company H" to "Company C," the company in which the man served.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the chairman of the Committee on Pensions state how the fact is.

Mr. PRATT. The bill has not been referred to the Committee on Pensions at this session; but the Senator from Michigan tells me that a bill for the relief of this person was passed, giving him a pension, at the last session of Congress, but the description of the company to which he belonged is wrong in the law. I have not examined the act. I have his statement for it that the only change that is made is in substituting one letter for another in the description of the company. If that is so of course the bill is right.

There being no objection the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

It proposes to amend the act granting a pension to Amos Farling so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Amos Farling, late private Company C, Twenty-seventh Regiment United States Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PRATT. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote just taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion will be entered.

CENTENNIAL MEDALS.

The bill (H. R. No. 1753) to authorize medals commemorating the one hundredth anniversary of the first meeting of the Continental Congress and of the Declaration of Independence was read twice by its title.

Mr. SUMNER. I think that may be acted on at once. Let it be read for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, which provides that medals, with appropriate devices, emblems, and inscriptions, be prepared at the mint of the United States at Philadelphia, to commemorate the one hundredth anniversary of the first meeting of the Continental Congress and of the Declaration of Independence; and that such medals, in any suitable metal or alloy, may, on and after the anniversary which they are designed to commemorate, be furnished to applicants therefor, subject to the provisions of section 52 of the coinage act of 1873, upon the payment of a sum not less than the cost thereof.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not think there can be any objection to that joint resolution, or any need of its reference.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no objection to the resolution—far from it; and yet I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that if it were to lie over until to-morrow, at all events, it might be convenient, and convenient in connection with another matter, which, although not obviously belonging to this, is so cognate to it that I think there are two or three Senators who would like to see this before the Senate acts upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

DISTRICT GOVERNMENT INVESTIGATION.

Mr. THURMAN. If there is no objection to its consideration to-day, the bankrupt bill being laid aside informally, I would move to take up the concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives in reference to the investigation of the affairs of this District.

Several SENATORS. It will lead to debate.

Mr. THURMAN. If it will lead to debate I do not want to call it up now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That resolution has not been received from the House of Representatives.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at four o'clock and thirty-three minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 3, 1874.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. J. G. BUTLER, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CONTRACTS FOR STATIONERY, ETC.

Mr. STOWELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) explanatory of a resolution approved January 31, 1868, entitled "A resolution limiting contracts for stationery and other supplies in the Executive Departments to one year;" which was read a first and second time.

Mr. STOWELL. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to ask that the joint resolution be put on its passage.

The joint resolution was read. It provides that the resolution approved January 31, 1868, entitled "A resolution limiting contracts for stationery and other supplies in the Executive Departments to one year," shall not be held or construed to apply to or include mail-bags, mail locks or keys, postal cards, postage-stamps, newspaper wrappers, or stamped envelopes.

The question was on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. STOWELL,] who is familiar with this subject, will explain in detail the effect of this proposition, and especially as regards contracts for postage-stamps, &c.

Mr. STOWELL. In reply to the gentleman from Indiana, I will state that the existing law limits the Postmaster-General and the heads of all the other Departments, in making contracts for stationery and other supplies, to one year; and the Attorney-General has given a decision that the words "other supplies" include mail-locks, mail bags and keys, and postage-stamps and stamped envelopes. The Postmaster-General says that it hampers him in making contracts to have the time limited to one year, in regard to mail locks and keys and mail-bags; that he has to furnish some two hundred thousand mail-locks to supply the service, and that it takes a year to distribute these locks among the various route-agents. An examination of the practice, ever since the mail system has been in operation, shows that but seven changes have really been made; the locks provided lasting about ten years. This decision of the Attorney-General was made on the 5th January of this year. The custom of the Post-Office Department has been to make the contracts for four years, and the changes have been made only about once in seven or eight years. If this ruling of the Attorney-General is adhered to he will have to make new contracts annually, and he desires to continue the same practice.

The same explanation applies to the other matters. It increases the cost. In the first place the cost of advertising each year is almost equal to the total cost of the locks. It increases the price of the locks, because these locks have to be patented; each patent is owned by the United States, and the man will not sell his patent and make his locks as reasonable for one year as he will under a four years' contract. The same reasoning as regards the cost of locks applies to the stamps. I am informed that the machinery for printing these stamps costs $200,000, and a man will not make a contract for one year as cheaply as he will for four years.

The Postmaster-General also desires to furnish locks for registered mail packages and for the street-boxes. I believe that he has been using the rejected locks used on mail-bags for street-boxes; but they have been found inadequate for the purpose, and he desires to make contracts for new locks, special locks for that service, and also special locks for the registered mail packages. The total additional cost of these locks above the present cost will be only some five or six thousand dollars, and the expense alone of advertising them will be some three or four thousand dollars; so that the additional expense would be very small, some two or three thousand dollars perhaps. That would be the first cost, and then the additional saving in making contracts for four years would much more than counterbalance that.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does this joint resolution come from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads?

Mr. STOWELL. It comes from that committee with their unanimous approval. I will state also to the gentleman that the Committee with the chairman of the committee of the Senate, went to the Postmaster-General last week officially and gave this subject full examination; and then went to F street where these locks and mail-bags are on exhibition, and investigated the whole subject, and became thoroughly convinced that the Postmaster-General should have authority to make contracts for more than one year.

Mr. KELLOGG. I would ask the gentleman if this will not save a large amount of money?

Mr. STOWELL. It will. As I have already stated to the House, the saving of the expense of advertising alone each year will almost cover the additional expense for the first year. I call for a vote.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. STOWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING OF A BILL.

Mr. DONNAN. I rise to make a privileged report. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report the following resolution, with the recommendation that it be adopted:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House three thousand extra copies of House bill No. 1572.

Mr. STORM. What is that bill?

Mr. DONNAN. It is the bill reported by the Committee on Banking and Currency. The cost of printing will be trifling, not exceeding a penny each copy.

The resolution was agreed to.

CITIZENS' NATIONAL BANK, HAGERSTOWN, MARYLAND.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty-five minutes past twelve o'clock, and the House resumes the consideration of the bill which comes over from the morning hour of Thursday last, the bill (H. R. No. 1573) authorizing the Citizens' National Bank of Hagerstown, Maryland, to change its location. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, the ending of the morning hour on Thursday last fortunately prevented me from giving utterance to some impatient words, which would have done injustice to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM,] and which I myself would have subsequently recalled with the greatest regret.

The House may remember that on last Thursday morning, on the call of the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which I am a humble member, under the instructions of that committee I reported to this House, with the recommendation that it do pass, a private bill authorizing a national bank, now located at Hagerstown, Maryland, to change its location. The chairman of the committee, with that kindness for which he is distinguished, thought that it afforded a suitable occasion to initiate a young member into the practice of the House. He thought, and I thought, that there could be no trouble in obtaining a formal consent of the House, which had been frequently given before, and never before been refused.

But, Mr. Speaker, my chairman forgot—I did not know—that there lurked in this bill an element of the greatest danger. It was not, sir, a proposition to remove the Bank of Hagerstown to the city of New York, or to the city of Brooklyn, or to the city of Indianapolis—it was to remove the Bank of Hagerstown to the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia. There, Mr. Speaker, was the great danger; this the source of our woes. There is a magic, which I found out in the proceedings of yesterday and which I ought to have known before, in that name. It is the wand of an enchanter, it is the "open sesame," at which a score of these desks fly open and a score of manuscripts rustle to the light.

Sir, when my distinguished friend from New York, my colleague on the committee, approached me and asked me to yield him some of my time, I recognized that eager look common to the face of approaching oratory, and gave him my sympathy. Unsuspicious, I did more—I gave him of my time. And I did right; for it is a cruel thing, when one has conceived a speech, to hinder him in the delivery of it. [Laughter.] Sir, when the gentleman from New York modestly but eagerly preferred his request, I not only gave sympathy and time, I gave him encouragement. I encouraged him as was Mrs. Dombey encouraged when an event was approaching of the gravest interest to the future of her house. Said her sister, as you will all remember, "Mrs. Dombey, you must make an effort." The gentleman from New York took my counsel, and made an effort. There, Mr. Speaker, was my terrible mistake, and no man knew it better than I did; no man felt it more deeply than I did, when I saw that neat manuscript unrolled on his table; when I heard a magnificent impeachment of this District rolling from gallery to gallery, in the assured triumphant tones as of one who should say, "Go to; I have got you now!" I thought of my poor little bill—it is not my bill, but belongs to another young member, here, like myself, for the first time—lying there so dead that I could have wept over it. Alas! the gentleman from New York proceeded to bury it. He took from beneath it all the dirt that had been cut, he piled above it all the dirt that had been filled, in this great city; at the sides he posted the bending figures of widows and orphans weeping over the ruins of assessment; and at the top the familiar figure of the governor of the District, boldly flaunting a petition for four millions into the very face of Congress. And then, to survey the hideous monument he had erected over my bill, he stepped to the peaceful valleys and green hills of his own section, and in a strain of touching and unpremeditated eloquence, that will please the republican voters of Lewis County—who voted right last time, and will vote right again—he declared his unfaltering preference for his own sweet home. And then, lest I might recover from his blow in time to make some sign, or lest some friend should be audacious enough in my defense to disturb the dying echoes, he moved, in my time, to lay my bill on the table.

Fortunate ending of the morning hour! Had I spoken then, I should have done my friend injustice. For, mark you, how simple, how natural, how complete is the explanation.

My friend had himself made a mistake; he had selected the wrong speech; he had mistaken my bill. The bill that I offered was one to authorize a bank to move to the District of Columbia, and to change its name. The gentleman from New York thought that the bill introduced was a bill to authorize the governor to move from the District, and to change his name. [Laughter.] When I learned this fact and received this explanation I was entirely satisfied, nay more, I was delighted; for it occurred to me that possibly, in addition to the odium of the District of Columbia, in the excitement of the moment, he might have crushed me with the military career of General Howard, or even more, with his own vindication anent the salary bill. [Laughter.]

I will occupy but a few minutes more to say why, in my opinion, this House as a court ought to find for the plaintiff, and for the reasons that were so well urged by the defendant. In the first place, if I remember aright, the objection urged was that the gentleman from New York would prefer that banks should establish themselves in the interior. Now in that desire, in that preference, I and the whole of this House concur. We would be delighted to establish banks in the remote rural districts—that the wilderness might rejoice, or the village become a city. But there is this trouble; we cannot do it. We have not yet reached that point in governmental science which will enable us to direct capital to go and stay where we think it needed. In that attempt we would fail. If the honorable gentleman could devise some legislation that could accomplish that purpose, that could force capital to go into the wilderness and into the villages and establish its banks there, no man would co-operate with him more earnestly than I. And I would insist that every little village in my own New Jersey should have its own bank, with ample circulation and redundant capital.

But, as I said before, we cannot do it. Under the general law, as it now is, banking capital can go where it pleases, and we do not pretend to dictate where it shall go or where it shall stay. But assume for the moment that we could do that; that the honorable gentleman could devise some kind of law by which we could say to capital "Go here and establish your bank," or "Go there and establish your bank, because it is needed;" even then, I submit, on the merits of this case, there is no reason why we should say to this bank "Stay in Hagerstown."

Sir, what is Hagerstown? It is a town of six thousand inhabitants. Is it without banking facilities? As I am informed by my friend from Maryland, it has five banks for its six thousand citizens—three banks of deposit and issue and two savings-banks. So if this bank is allowed to change its location Hagerstown will still have four banks to satisfy its moderate wants. More than that; compare the matter in a larger sphere; make the contrast between the State of Maryland and the District of Columbia. The State of Maryland, if I remember aright, has, under our national-banking law, by right, $9,000,000 of circulation. It has, by favor, in excess of that amount, $1,800,000 of circulation. Take the District of Columbia; under the law it has a right to $1,200,000 of circulation. But all of that circulation is not yet taken up. On these facts I submit to my friend from New York that even if we could make banks go and stay just exactly where we want, this is not a case where we should exercise our absolute will against the request of the petitioners.

Sir, if we refuse to allow this bank to change its situs, we cannot force it to remain in Hagerstown; it can wind up its business there and then appear here. And what would this House, under the lead of the gentleman from New York, accomplish but churlishly to refuse a consent which is sought mainly to facilitate the transfer, except to say to these banking people of Hagerstown, "You shall not benefit by any reputation for ability and honesty acquired in your career in Hagerstown; you shall not have the advantage of it in the District of Columbia." In other words we say to them, "You shall not take with you to the District of Columbia the well-earned reputation for thrift and industry which you have acquired in your own city, although we cannot prevent you from carrying your capital there."

So much for the first objection, which was, if I remember aright, that we should prefer to keep the banks in the country districts, and away from our cities.

The second objection was that the District of Columbia did not tax personal property. Sir, I shall not waste my time in considering whether it is a good system of taxation that puts the whole burden on real estate. That distinguished publicist, Mr. David A. Wells, has held that it is on the whole the most efficient mode of taxation. The gentleman from New York says it is the most inefficient. Under these circumstances, if it is a contest between authorities and names, (I admit that I have not looked into the merits of the question,) I am not going off-hand to admit that I am right with the gentleman or wrong with Mr. Wells. What I do claim is, that the question of taxation by the District of Columbia is not in any way pertinent to the decision of this case. If I had not perfect confidence in the honesty and sincerity of the gentleman from New York I should think he wanted to give to the members of this House the impression that if this bank of Hagerstown was removed to this District it would escape all taxation. But this would be a wrong impression. You, Mr. Speaker, and those of the House who are familiar with the banking law, know that the Bank of Hagerstown will be taxed just as much in the District of Columbia as it is taxed in Maryland, so far as the Government of the United States is concerned. I mean to say that wherever a national bank may be placed the national law covers it, the national tax-assessor and the national tax-gatherer visit it, and collect the tax of 1 per cent. on circulation, the half of 1 per cent. on deposits, the half of 1 per cent. on capital. So that the Bank of Hagerstown, if its location be changed to this District, will not escape any taxation that benefits the United States. As it just occurs to me, the United States by this transfer not only does not lose any taxation, it gains; for, as the House will remember, the bank, according to the bill, is to make this change of location only upon the condition that it shall increase its capital from $50,000 to $200,000. So that when the Bank of Hagerstown comes to this District (if it is allowed to come) it will still pay not only the same taxes to the national Government but it will pay more taxes, because it will pay upon a capital of $200,000 instead of a capital of $50,000. Besides this, the tax will in all probability be still further increased in another form. A bank having a capital of $200,000 will naturally allure larger deposits on which national tax will accrue than a bank having a capital of but $50,000. Therefore, so far as the argument as to taxation goes, it amounts to nothing; indeed, it shows that this bank, if it shall come to the District of Columbia, will afford a better field, a wider area, for taxation, and will consequently pay more money to the national Treasury than it does in Hagerstown.

The only view in which the question of taxation would, in my opinion, arise would be as a question between the District of Columbia and the State of Maryland. If it were any of our business to look out for these conflicting interests, the State of Maryland might say, "We object to this transfer because it takes from our State capital of $50,000, which we have the right to tax, and transfers it to the District of Columbia, where the State of Maryland will have no right to tax it." If this point had been urged by the gentleman from New York—if he had spoken, not for the republican voters of Lewis County, New York, but for Hagerstown, in the State of Maryland, and had said that by this measure we were inflicting a loss upon "my Maryland," then I would recognize the force. But how does this matter stand? Instead of there being any complaint from the State of Maryland, who would have proper ground for complaint, it is the State of Maryland that comes here and asks us to pass this measure. The bill is introduced by a member from Maryland, and it is the earnest desire of that State that the measure should succeed.

I beg pardon of the House for occupying so much time. I yield to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM.]

Mr. MERRIAM. Mr. Speaker, I am delighted that my friend from New Jersey [Mr. PHELPS] has had an opportunity to display his ingenuity and his eloquence; but I shall not attempt to follow him into those fields which carry us away from the merits of this bill. He has alluded to the governor of this District. In doing so he has gone beyond anything that I said in my speech the other day. I am aware that it is the impression of many men in this House that whoever alludes unfavorably in the least to this District, or rather to those who have the management of the District, subjects himself to attack by the local press; which I do not believe, because I believe the press of the District is honorable and free and untrammeled. It has been said also that whoever opposes the demands of this District subjects himself to social ostracism, which means, I suppose, that he is to be deprived of the bonbons which destroy the tone of the stomach and invite dyspepsia; that he is to be deprived of the manufactured wines, which burn up the blood of those who indulge in them, and make us prematurely old.

Mr. Speaker, the point really at issue here, and the one which we are to consider, is whether we shall remove a bank to this District, where there will be no local taxation upon it, thereby giving to the stockholders a bonus equal to $5,000 a year over national banks located elsewhere, or whether, if the bank is to be removed, we ought not put up this great privilege at auction and to award it to the highest bidder, giving the proceeds to the District, thereby lessening its demands upon Congress for appropriations.

Why, Mr. Speaker, the property belonging to the Government which is located in this city is valued at $75,000,000. At the rate of taxation on real estate here, which is 2 per cent., we should pay the District annually about $1,500,000. Instead of paying only this amount, we are called upon for $3,000,000 or $4,000,000. Upon the valuation of real estate in this District, amounting to between $90,000,000 and $100,000,000, the District receives, at 2 per cent., an amount equal to about $1,900,000. Now my point is (and it is one that we are to consider) that if the personal property in this District were taxed, and taxed at the same rate as real estate, 2 per cent., it would yield an income of between three and four hundred thousand dollars annually, which would lessen to that extent the amount we are called upon to pay for the support of this District out of taxation levied upon the people of the country. I submit that we here in Congress have no right to allow our constituents to be taxed for such a purpose, when the wealthy people of this District are not taxed one dime on their personal property. Why, Mr. Speaker, any one of the Astors or the Vanderbilts, of New York, might come here and put his safe containing all his income-paying property by the side of some humble dwelling which some citizen here has been for years toiling to pay for, and he would not be taxed one dollar to support the government of the District, while that man in his humble homestead might be turned out of doors.

I submit there is no justice whatever in this; that if we are to remove the bank here we shall first insist its stock shall be taxed the same as like property is taxed elsewhere.

Mr. HUBBELL. I should like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will allow me.

Mr. MERRIAM. Certainly.

Mr. HUBBELL. If the State of Michigan does not assess taxes on personal property, would the gentleman for that reason deprive it of the benefits of the national-banking act?

Mr. MERRIAM. I believe there is no place on this continent where bank capital does not pay State or municipal taxes except this District; hence the honorable gentleman's question has no force.

Mr. PHELPS. I now call for the previous question. If the previous question is seconded I shall take none of my time myself, and I believe I am under the rules entitled to an hour; but I would like fifteen or twenty minutes, because I have promised that time to other gentlemen, among whom is the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. LOWNDES.]

The House divided; and there were—ayes 94, noes 45.

So the demand for the previous question was seconded.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the bill be laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. Pending the demand for the previous question, it having been seconded, the gentleman from Indiana moves to lay the bill upon the table.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 53, noes 97.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

The main question was ordered to be put.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey is entitled to the floor for one hour.

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. PHELPS. Certainly.

Mr. BUCKNER. I understand the object of this bill is to remove a national bank from Hagerstown, Maryland, to Washington, in this District, and at the same time to increase its circulation of $50,000 to $200,000.

Mr. PHELPS. Not to increase its circulation, but to increase its capital.

Mr. BUCKNER. To increase its capital. I stand corrected. I ask the gentleman this question. Is not the necessary effect of increasing the capital $150,000 a local contraction of the currency to an extent of the difference between 90 per cent. and the cost of the bonds?

Mr. PHELPS. I think not; I do not see it.

Mr. BUCKNER. I should like very much to say something on that question if I get the chance.

Mr. PHELPS. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. LOWNDES.]

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman allow me to state my objections to this bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey has yielded to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. LOWNDES. Mr. Speaker, the stockholders of this bank went out of the State of Maryland into the State of New York and bought circulation, and brought that circulation into the State of Maryland, and started a bank in Hagerstown. They have been in business for several years, and now, finding they are losing money daily, they ask at our hands this privilege of removing their bank from Hagerstown to Washington City, in this District. It is their capital and their circulation, and they ought to have the privilege of removing the same from place to place, just as the merchant moves his stock of goods. I see no objection to it at all. Besides it is a mere local matter. Hagerstown is in my district, and the people there do not care about the removal of this bank, because the banking capital there is entirely sufficient for the demands of the people.

I yield the remaining portion of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. TODD.]

Mr. TODD. Mr. Speaker, my apology, if any is needed, for desiring to discuss this measure briefly arises out of the fact that some of my constituents are connected with this bank, and I naturally feel anxious their wishes should be complied with.

Latterly it has become quite fashionable for certain parties, both in season and out of season, to stigmatize the officials of Washington City with the crime and guilt of fraud and dishonesty, and to hold them up as objects worthy of public scorn and execration, and this, too, in the absence of all proof in support of their charges, and in defiance of refutation furnished by repeated investigations. The reiteration of these stale charges, under circumstances which preclude the accused from making defense, and in connection with matters with which they have nothing to do, seems to me a violation of that spirit of candor and fair play which ought always to characterize the conduct and utterance of honorable men. I have no personal acquaintance with any of the officials of Washington City nor any interest in any of their measures. It is not my province or duty to defend them from attack or to vindicate the wisdom and policy of their measures; but, sir, I cannot help thinking that men who have had the courage and sagacity, in the face of malignant opposition and persistent obloquy, to initiate and perfect a grand system of public improvements which has transformed this city from a marsh and mudhole to a magnificent and beautiful metropolis, will not suffer much detriment or much agony of spirit from the gentle criticism or playful wit of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM,] who the other day traveled clear out of the record to read his premeditated tirade against them. Time, which eventually makes all things even, will vindicate the character of these men and their measures, and rank them, as I believe they deserve to be, among the public benefactors of this District, as men who have had the wisdom and courage to rise above the dead level of the past and the sagacity to forecast the benefits and advantages which would result from keeping up with the modern spirit of progress and improvement.

If I understood the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM,] he objected to this bill on the ground that banks and personal property were not taxed for municipal purposes in this District, and that his constituents were taxed for its benefit. I have failed to see the relevancy of this objection, or to understand how his constituents are interested in the payment of local taxes by this bank in the borough of Hagerstown. For it is manifest that the only effect of the transfer of this institution from Hagerstown to this city would be to relieve it from local taxes there. On this account the people of Hagerstown may object with some show of reason to the trsnsfer; but how the gentleman from New York and his constituents, living in a distant State, would be injured I fail to comprehend. For all purposes of Federal taxation, the bank will pay the same amount of taxes here as it now pays in Hagerstown. The law assessing Federal taxes on national banks is uniform in its operation in all localities, and levies the same percentage of tax on the banks in this District as it does elsewhere. Therefore the location of a national bank does not alter its responsibility or its liabilities to the General Government.

This measure proposes no new thing. It is sanctioned by uniform precedent, and when the House is informed that it is approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, by the Comptroller of the Currency, and by the Representative in this body from the Hagerstown district, it is difficult to discover the reason that should induce a stranger to object to it. Hagerstown is but a small place, having a population not exceeding five thousand. It is provided with abundant capital, exclusive of this bank, to meet all its legitimate wants. There this institution cannot find useful and profitable employment for its capital; here it can; and it will fill up the gap occasioned by the insolvency of the First National Bank. The location of the bank here would add just so much capital to the District; it would increase the credit facilities of the citizens of Washington City. It would cheapen the price of money, and would afford facilities for the outgrowth and development of that new spirit of enterprise which has so happily superseded and conquered the old torpid and ruinous policy which has hitherto characterized this city, and which by its decrepitude and parsimony deadened the spirit of improvement, and made this city, the metropolis of the country, a by-word and a scorn.

I think this measure should be judged of by its own merits and not be tangled up with considerations and conditions with which it has no connection and no interest, and over which it can have no control. If the gentleman from New York desires to strike at this District or its officials, let him do so manfully and courageously, and not over the shoulders of innocent parties. I know that, so far as this bank is concerned, all who are interested in it desire the transfer; and if the people at Hagerstown, if the parties who are interested in questions of taxation, are willing that the transfer should be made, it is exceedingly strange that parties not interested in any of those questions should raise an objection to it. I trust the House will pass the bill by an overwhelming vote.

Mr. PHELPS. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman who represents the District of Columbia, [Mr. CHIPMAN.]

Mr. CHIPMAN. I rise to correct a misapprehension on the part of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MERRIAM.] When he addressed the House on this subject he conveyed the impression to the House that all classes of personal property are exempt from taxation in this District. I find myself in an embarrassing situation, by reason of the representations which are made on this subject. On one day the District is arraigned for excessive taxation, and on the next some one arraigns us because we do not tax enough. Now, I take this position, that the question of taxation is a question of policy as to the best means of raising revenues for the purposes for which the tax is levied. We have exempted, then, a certain class of personal property. That is to say, if the gentleman from New York, coming here to represent his constituents, chooses to bring his bonds and his ready money with him, he can put them safely away without any fear of the tax-collector. But if he chooses to use his means here to shave notes, or in banking, or in dealing in any kind of merchandise, the tax-gatherer waits upon him immediately. That is the form in which our personal taxation takes shape. It is not upon the bonds which people hold in their safes, but upon the active capital of the District. And the reason is a specific one with us; it may not hold true in regard to other cities.

We are not a commercial people here; whether we shall ever be is a question yet to be solved. We are a people engaged in a peculiar line of occupation, with which you are all familiar. Our people generally are not rich. They have no considerable personal property. But it is the interest of this District to induce those who have large means to come here and live, and expend their money in our midst, not in traffic among us, not in merchandise, if you please, but in a liberal method of life. We think we will get more benefit from that class of people who reside here but a portion of the year, by adopting this liberal policy toward them, and thus encouraging on their part a generous expenditure of money in our midst, than we will by levying a heavy personal tax. But we are taxing our real estate up to the limit you have fixed by act of Congress, and we have so increased our indirect tax on personal property, by enlarging cost of licenses and in other ways, that we hear complaints everywhere of burdensome taxation. Either the gentleman from New York is greatly mistaken, or these complaints are groundless.

Again, another motive we had in exempting certain personal property is this: That we never derived any considerable revenue from this kind of taxation; the cost and difficulties of collection led us to believe that it was wise to exempt it. We found, after taking out that exempt from execution, there was little left to tax. Gentlemen must remember that our wealthy residents, with few exceptions, are residents here temporarily, and, as I have said, we do not think it wise to keep this class away. The result of this policy is seen by the stately mansions springing up everywhere in our city, adding largely to the assessable property of the District. But we do tax personal property largely.

Let me call your attention to the facts in relation to the personal taxes in this District. If you examine the tax act of August 23, 1871, you will find over fifty different classes of personal property that are taxed—taxes on merchandise, licenses, banking, life and fire insurance companies, and almost every other kind of business and occupation of life. The taxes have been so largely increased under this government that the people have insisted that the tax-gatherer should not go through their houses and tax their furniture, go into the office of the lawyer and tax his books, go into the office of the physician and tax the instruments of his profession.

Mr. DURHAM. I desire to ask the gentleman one question. Suppose this bank be removed to the District of Columbia, is there any law here under which it can be taxed?

Mr. CHIPMAN. It can be at the rate of fifty cents on every thousand dollars of capital. That is quite as much as the tax in some of the States on bank capital.

Mr. FIELD. O, no.

Mr. CHIPMAN. Well, sir, that is a question not for you to determine at all; it is a matter for us to determine. If we think that we derive greater benefit from the business which banks carry on in our midst, and place only a small tax upon them, Congress ought not to criticise our action.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Is there anything in the organic law of the District to prevent the local Legislature from taxing the property of banks or any other personal property?

Mr. CHIPMAN. There is no law prohibiting it at all; we simply abstain from a certain class of taxation to which I have already alluded.

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CHIPMAN. I have but three minutes, and I prefer to make my statement to the House; after which I will gladly answer the gentleman.

Now, sir, there may be a legitimate argument derived from the suggestions of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MERRIAM] that we come to Congress asking for a greater amount for local and District purposes than we would if we taxed personal property. The gentleman from New York states in his speech this proposition: He says that he hopes Congress will vote no dollar more to improve the city until all the property of the city shares alike the burden of its government. Sir, I accept that proposition, and I call attention to the fact that the Government owns $100,000,000 worth of property in this city, which is not taxed one dollar. When Congress recognizes its duty to pay some just and fair proportion of municipal expenses here, based, if you please, on the value of the property of Government, it will then be time to talk about coercing our citizens into payment of greater taxes. The gentleman says that the last Congress was very liberal to the District of Columbia. So it was, and we are very grateful for it. We are very grateful to the Forty-second Congress because it invited examination into the affairs of the District of Columbia, and showed a disposition to join with us in making this a capital worthy the nation; but I accept the proposition of the gentleman from New York, although I am afraid he will fly from it when the question comes to a vote. We are willing to pay any tax upon our property Congress may impose, if Congress do the reciprocal thing and impose a like tax on the Government property, which all admit is equally benefited by improvements with our own. When this adjustment is made we will never ask a dollar from you for any charity or special object in the District of Columbia. Sir, if you will levy the tax according to all the property here, we shall be quite content; and we shall hope then to be rid of the criticism constantly made of our action, whatever it may be. We hope that you will settle a policy in regard to the District which shall be permanent, wise, judicious, and in keeping with the spirit of the age. Sir, we have shown a disposition to build up your city; we are beautifying it; and instead of allowing it to remain an unsightly, unattractive place, a disgrace to the nation, we are making it a city which will compare with any capital of any nation in the world.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. On that question I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 148, nays 89, not voting 51; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. PHELPS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TEMPORARY-LOAN CERTIFICATES.

Mr. MAYNARD, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, a bill (H. R. No. 975) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870; and moved that the same be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WHEELER. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of resuming the consideration of the special order, being the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. KELLOGG in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, a bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has twenty-five minutes of his hour remaining, of which he yields fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BECK.] By order of the House all general debate upon this bill is limited to one hour after the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall have expired.

Mr. BECK. When the committee was last in session I had the floor trying to show that by the exercise of proper economy, by the cutting down of items of expenditure in the Army appropriation bill and in the other bills to be reported by the Committee on Appropriations, as that committee seems disposed to do, we would be able, not only to avoid the necessity of increased taxation, but the necessity of borrowing more money. I was trying to show that the revenues of the Government were sufficient for all its proper and necessary wants. At the time the hammer fell I had read the act entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," approved March 18, 1869. I was contending that that act was at the bottom of much of the financial trouble that has come upon the country; that the law itself had been violated, and, being a measure wholly in the interest of bondholders, that it ought to be repealed; that the purchase of bonds under it ought to be stopped; and that if these things were done owing to the amount of interest, $30,000,000 annually, that we now are relieved from, as compared with the amount we had to pay four or five years ago, instead of $319,000,000, as estimated by the Department; being necessary to maintain this Government, $250,000,000 would be amply sufficient for that purpose—indeed, would be extravagant.

I was proceeding to show that the act of 1869 was flagrantly unjust, because it was a fraud, and all the proceedings under it have been frauds, not only directly calculated but intended to depreciate the currency of the country, and to pay the bondholders money that they were not entitled to; that by reason of that act and the proceedings under it the bondholders to-day have received $40,000,000 in gold which belong to the people of the country, all of which has been wrongfully wrung from the sweat of the laboring poor. I propose now to make that statement good. Of course in ten or fifteen minutes I can only suggest facts, which members can examine in detail for themselves; I cannot argue anything.

There is not a man on this floor who does not know that these five-twenty bonds, which are now being paid in gold, were payable in the legal-tender notes of the country. Every legal-tender note in the pockets of each gentleman here bears the indorsement that it is a legal tender at its face value, and shall be receivable "for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt." In the year 1867 the Finance Committee of the Senate of the United States settled that question in a unanimous report, which I hope gentlemen will read. It is Report No. 4, Fortieth Congress, second session, and was made December 17, 1867. In that report the Finance Committee of the Senate made that fact conclusive. I will only read a few extracts now. They say:

> The act under which the five-twenty bonds were issued also provides for the issue of United States notes, and declares that these notes "shall be lawful money and a legal tender in payment of all debts public or private." These notes were issued to an amount of $400,000,000 before the bonds were negotiated. It is claimed that this provision negatives the implication drawn from the payment of previous loans in coin, especially as when previous loans were made and paid no other kind of money existed, or could have been contemplated. * * *
> And it is contended that, conceding that the agents of the Government construed

the law as binding the United States to pay the principal of this debt in coin, yet that this construction was not so generally acquiesced in and adopted by both parties to the contract as to create a moral obligation which the United States is bound to execute to preserve its faith. Is it true that this construction was so generally admitted as to make it a part of the contract? Congress uniformly refused to declare this construction as to the five-twenty bonds, but did do so as to the ten-forty bonds. And it is a further and very significant fact that every State in the Union, with, perhaps, the exception of Massachusetts, put a different construction on this act. Every State had a public debt. It stood in precisely the same position as the national debt. Its bonds had uniformly been paid, principal and interest, in coin, and yet under the law they held that their public faith was complied with when they paid either principal or interest in legal-tender notes, and this construction was acquiesced in by their creditors. So with corporations and private citizens who had contracted debts which by law and custom had been previously paid in coin, they considered themselves, and were, released by payment in legal-tenders. Now, by a well-established principle of the law of contracts, when it is sought to vary the meaning of the words of a contract by a contemporaneous construction, it must be shown that both parties acquiesced in it, and understood and acted upon it in precisely the same sense; otherwise the words of the contract must govern. When a general rule is laid down, and an exception is made, it implies that there are no other exceptions.

Duties on imported goods and interest on the public debt are excepted from the legal-tender clause. This implies the principal of the debt is not excepted. The construction drawn from the payment of previous loans in gold is answered by the fact that the act under which this loan was issued expressly declares that a note shall be lawful money as well as gold, and shall be receivable in payment of a public debt. The argument that a construction was put upon the law by the agents of the United States is answered by the fact that this was not a mutual construction recognized by both parties as a part of the contract, but was rather an opinion based upon a supposition of a state of facts which, when the five years expired, did not actually exist.

It is clear that if the bonds are "payable" when due in legal-tenders, they are "redeemable" after five years from date in the same kind of money. The word "payable" imports a duty or obligation which must be performed at the time stipulated. The word "redeemable" implies a discretionary power which may be or may not be exercised. But the same kind of money in the same mode tendered will redeem a note or pay a note.

I refer also, in this connection, to the speech of a man who had a great deal of authority in this House in his time, and whose words may now be listened to with attention; I mean Mr. Stevens, of Pennsylvania. When the proposition was made to pay these bonds in gold, he rose in his place and said to this House, (I quote from the Congressional Globe:)

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. What was that law? What bonds of a certain amount should bear 5 per cent. interest in gold? Now, up to the time they fall due we must pay them faithfully. After they fall due they are payable in money, just as the gentleman understands "money;" just as I understand it; just as we all understood it when we passed the law authorizing that loan; just as it was a dozen times explained upon the floor by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means when called upon by gentlemen to explain what it meant, and just as the whole House agreed that it meant.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. O'NEILL obtained the floor.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I should like to have one or two minutes more.

Mr. O'NEILL. I will yield to my colleague one or two minutes.

Mr. STEVENS, of Pennsylvania. I want to say that if this loan was to be paid according to the intimation of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. ROSS;] if I knew that any party in this country would go for paying in coin that which is payable in money, thus enhancing it one-half; if I knew there was such a platform and such a determination this day on the part of any party, I would vote for the other side—Frank Blair and all. I would vote for no such swindle upon the taxpayers of the country; I should vote for no such speculation in favor of the large bondholders, the millionaires, who take advantage of our folly in granting them coin payment of interest. And I declare—well, it is hard to say it—but if even Frank Blair stood upon the platform of paying the bonds according to the contract, and the republican candidates stood upon the platform of paying bloated speculators twice the amount we agreed to pay them, then I would vote for Frank Blair—even if a worse man than Seymour headed the ticket. That is all I want to say.

Nobody disputed that until the act of 1869 was brought forward, and even that act made this provision. After declaring that the intention was to pay both bonds and notes in gold, it provided:

But none of said interest-bearing obligations not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity, unless at such time United States notes shall be convertible into coin at the option of the holder, or unless at such time the bonds of the United States bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed can be sold at par in coin.

It is not pretended that the notes of the United States have from that day to this ever been convertible into coin. It is not pretended that those five-twenty bonds are due to or demandable by the holders. The United States may pay them after five years, but they are not payable for twenty years. The holder cannot demand payment. They are not due until payment can be demanded. In the face of this declaration put in the law itself that they shall not be redeemed or paid before maturity, unless at the time United States notes are convertible into coin, why is it that the Secretary of the Treasury has gone on, and why is it that Congress has sanctioned his going on, in paying to these bondholders $440,000,000 of legal-tender notes in exchange for $400,000,000 of bonded indebtedness?

A very distinguished gentleman—a gentleman recognized on the other side as good authority—has made a speech on this subject lately—where, I do not care to state; it is against the rule to read Senate proceedings here—from which I will take the liberty to read. He said:

We have paid $400,000,000 of the public debt, and we boast of it—of debt not due for years. We have paid to redeem that debt a premium of $40,000,000. In other words, we have paid $440,000,000 to redeem four hundred millions of debt not yet due, and we have not redeemed a single debt that was due in March, 1869; but, on the contrary, we have increased the kind of debts then due more in proportion than the increase of our population. And, sir, while our promise did advance the credit of our bonds and of our notes alike, and while the execution of that promise as to our bonds has advanced our bonds to above par in gold, yet we have done nothing whatever to redeem the second clause of that pledge; but, on the other hand, all we have done has been done with the intention and with the effect of depreciating the value of our notes.

Mark the language—"with the intention and with the effect of depreciating the value of our notes;" and it is true.

The same distinguished gentleman says further:

Fifty-six millions of the money that we have applied to the payment of debt not yet due would have brought all the remaining greenbacks up to par in gold, would have made our bank-notes convertible into the standard of gold, and we would have had, almost without knowing it, specie payment—a solid, safe, and secure basis. The forty millions of greenbacks we paid as premium for our bonds would have accomplished this result. Thousands of men who have been ruined by the false ideas that sprang from this fever-heated, depreciated paper money would be now useful, able, and successful business men, instead of being ruined by bankruptcy. * * * * * * * * *

But this promise to pay in coin extended to the bondholder. We promised to pay the bondholder gold for his bond and the people gold for their greenbacks. We have fulfilled our promise to the bondholder. We have paid him in gold. We have bought the gold. We have paid him at a premium of 10 per cent. on our currency. Not a single effort, not a single measure, has succeeded in either House of Congress that looks to the redemption of the promise to the people who hold these greenbacks, and which measure their daily toil in their productive avocations.

The same gentleman also states that the notes of France and other countries have been kept good because they were received for customs dues; and ours have been depreciated as they are to-day because we have refused to receive them for customs dues and have made this discrimination for the purpose of keeping them depreciated. Let me read the language:

In France, with a large currency, that currency may be used to pay the same as gold for any form of debt of or to the government, even the form of duties.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I should like to ask a question just here.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather not be interrupted now.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. It is on the point the Senator was just discussing.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. I ask whether, in the Senator's judgment, the value of the currency in France depends so much on the convertibility of the notes into bonds, or in their being made lawful money for all purposes, which our greenbacks are not?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt that it would greatly advance our greenbacks if they were allowed to be received at the custom-houses for duties.

Mr. FERRY, of Michigan. Is that not the case in France?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

The point to which I desire to call attention is, that $40,000,000 have been wrongfully taken from the tax-payers and handed over to the holders of our bonds in direct violation even of the provisions of that odious law. I maintain that no more of the public debt should be paid in that way; that whatever payments may be made ought to be made in compliance with existing law.

But gentlemen say "We are changing the character of our bonds and getting a lower rate of interest." How are you doing that? It is costing 2 per cent. to do it, and every bond issued under the act of 1870 contained a clause providing that the bond should be payable, principal and interest, in coin—a provision which the five-twenties did not contain. It was also necessary to put into those bonds of 1870 a further provision, that they should be exempt from Federal taxation as well as from State and municipal taxation, which was not the case with the five-twenties. But for those two provisions inserted in those bonds the Government could not have sold one of them. Therefore it cannot be said that our bonds can be exchanged for others bearing a lower rate of interest at par as an avoidance of the other clause in the law of 1869.

No, gentlemen; the trouble is this, that Congress has been systematically depreciating the paper of the Government for the express purpose of enriching the men who hold our bonds—men who bought them for greenbacks when greenbacks were most depreciated, never expecting to receive payment in anything else, and who under the present system are not only exempt from taxation, but are enabled to sell their gold interest at from 10 to 20 per cent. premium. The supporters of the Administration have pursued this policy for the further purpose of increasing to the extent of the premium on gold the already monstrous tariff imposed upon the country, by which our commerce has been driven from the seas and the cost of everything that the consumer and the producer of agricultural products need has been doubled. This policy has been pursued for the further purpose of making the Government a gold gambler in the markets of the world, and for the pupose of controlling the prices of gold and stocks on Wall street for political purposes. Whenever the Government abandons this policy, and takes its own paper for its own debts, that moment it will come to par with gold. The moment you do that, every bondholder and their advocates here will of course cry out "Bad faith!" because they will not get the premium that they now get upon their interest. Every protected monopolist will clamor against such a policy, because you diminish his protection to the extent that you destroy the premium on gold. Government officials will clamor, because you destroy their power over the commercial relations of the country. But the people of the country are demanding this of us, and they will force it upon Congress whether you like it or not.

Because Congress (for all the responsibility rests here) has kept up unjust and unequal taxation, grinding the poor to the earth and enriching those who are already rich enough, because Congress has pursued this course, we are in our present difficulties about banking and currency. Until that policy be changed you may plaster the evil as you please, but you will never relieve the cause of our difficulties. This Government pays to the bondholder, as a national banker, 6 per cent. in gold upon his bonds, and at the same time lends him 90 per cent. of his bonds in current money, taxing him only 1 per cent. for it, while he lends it out to the people at 10, 12, or 15 per cent. Thus we give a monopoly of banking, a monopoly by tariff taxation, and a monopoly of our gold to great combinations of wealth. Such a policy must break down any party that maintains it. The poverty of the people and the extortions of the Government are just now hastening the issue.

All history shows that whenever a government earnestly and honestly uses its own credit for the benefit of its people it can maintain any financial system. Sir, the State of Kentucky demonstrated that fact many years ago. I set forth the facts on the floor of this House some years ago, and as I cannot state it better now, I will read what I said then:

Kentucky many years taught the world a lesson, under the most adverse circumstances, of the value of public credit when honestly and faithfully used for the public welfare. The United States Bank, which, with all its powers, was a pigmy compared to the hydra-headed monster we now have to contend with, had after the close of the war of 1812-'15, broken down the State banks in Kentucky and Ohio. These States attempted to tax the United States branch banks within their limits.

The State laws were annulled by the Federal courts. The tax imposed and collected amounted to $100,000, was taken from the State treasury of Ohio, and suits innumerable were commenced by the bank against the people of Kentucky, on whose property mortgages almost sufficient to absorb it were held by the bank. Meanwhile the United States Bank currency was withdrawn from the State and the gold was taken from the branches and hauled in wagons to the mother bank at Philadelphia. Ruin stared the people in the face almost to the same extent that it will again if you put your scheme of specie payment into operation. The Kentucky Legislature about 1820, as a last effort to save the people, chartered a bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, with a capital of $3,000,000, for a limited term of years, and interposed replevin liens to prevent immediate sales under execution. It had not a dollar in gold to bank upon; it had nothing but the credit of the State, and that, too, at a time when the credit of the State was down to its lowest ebb. The courts were hostile to the relief laws; the leading men of the State opposed the bank; Mr. Clay was attorney for the Bank of the United States, and everything seemed against its success. The State could not emit bills of credit, could not coin money, make its notes a legal tender, lay impost duties, nor exercise any of the powers by which the United States can maintain its credit; yet in spite of all these obstacles it made its bank a grand success, in spite of the opposition of the United States and its great bank, in defiance of the determined opposition of its own leading jurists and statesman.

Hon. F. P. Blair, then a young and comparatively unknown man, and a few others, since become eminent for their ability and wisdom, stood by it and sustained it. Mr. Crittenden, though opposed to it, when elected its president by the Legislature accepted the position. Honest and competent men managed its branches. The people borrowed its notes and paid their taxes and their debts to each other with them. Men from other States, fearing it was that or nothing, took them for debts and purchased the wheat, corn, hogs, tobacco, and whisky from the people. Commerce revived; property rose in value; prosperity took the place of ruinous depression; new energy inspired the masses; light came out of darkness. The corpse of the public credit had been touched as by the wand of the magician, and it sprang upon its feet. The people stood by the bank and the credit of the State single-handed and alone, without a dollar of gold, and not only saved them, but made them great and prosperous. The notes of the bank, at first at a discount of 50 per cent., were at par in less than three years; and when it wound up, after some twelve years, it not only redeemed all its paper in gold but left a large surplus fund, which was appropriated to and formed the basis of the school-fund of the State.

From that time on Kentucky grew more and more prosperous. To-day she owes nothing, and her credit is second to none of her sister States.

Pennsylvania did the same thing in 1841; so did Indiana; North Carolina did it before the revolutionary war; each with similar results. Beyond all question the United States can make its paper as good as gold whenever an honest effort is made to do so. Whenever class legislation is abandoned and the people receive the measure of justice now reserved for the bondholder, and the great moneyed monopolies of the country——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEREFORD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] in charge of this bill has told this House he very much favors the reduction of the expenditures of the Government, and courts the criticism of the various appropriations in this bill. I desire to call his attention on page 7, commencing with the one hundred and thirty-fifth line and ending with the one hundred and forty-first line, to a provision in reference to which I desire to submit some remarks. It is as follows:

For engineer depot at Willet's Point, New York, namely, remodeling portions of bridge equipage and for the current expenses of the depot, purchase of engineering material for use in instruction of engineer battalion, and purchase and repair of instruments for general service of the Corps of Engineers, $9,000.

I propose to refer briefly to the testimony of the General of the Army in reference to that appropriation, and if the members of this House are honestly in favor of a reduction, of the expenditures of this Government I do not think they can begin better than at this very appropriation for an engineer depot at Willet's Point, New York.

Now, what does the General of our Army tell this House in the testimony taken before the Committee on Military Affairs in regard to this very engineer depot at Willet's Point? I beg the attention of the gentlemen on the other side of the House. I tell them they have the power in their own hands to diminish the appropriations to this extent, and to the same extent to diminish the burdens imposed upon the people. If they will listen to the testimony of the General of the Army, General Sherman, upon this very subject, on page 19 of the printed testimony, they will see that this appropriation at least ought to be struck out. On page 19 of the testimony General Sherman says, after going over the whole Army, regiment after regiment:

That completes the entire regular organization of the regiments of the Army of the United States as it now stands. In this same official report which I hold in my hand I find an engineer battalion, composed of five companies of engineers, numbering 329, four of which are at Willet's Point, New York Harbor, and one at West Point, New York.

Willet's Point is the very point for which this $9,000 appropriation is asked. What does General Sherman say with regard to these soldiers? What does he say with regard to these 329 men? I invite the attention of gentlemen to it. He says:

Over these I have no command or control whatever, and ought not to speak of them with any degree of freedom. If you think proper to cut them off it is not my business to try to prevent it. These troops are soldiers when it is to their interest to be soldiers, and they are not soldiers when it is their interest not to be.

Yet this committee, having charge of this bill which appropriates at one dash $29,000,000 for the support of the Army for one year, seeks to continue in employment these 329 men, whom General Sherman says he has no control over, who are soldiers when it suits them to be soldiers and who are not soldiers when it suits them not to be; who, in other words, are "invincible in peace and invisible in war." [Laughter.]

General Sherman tells you in this same testimony, and General Townsend tells you the same thing, that upon an average our soldiers cost us $1,000 each. Here is an appropriation for 329 men. General Sherman says they are soldiers when it suits them to be soldiers, and not soldiers when it does not suit them to be. At the average rate of $1,000 a man we have here an appropriation of $350,000 for 350 men. It is more money than is appropriated for the whole of the Military Academy at West Point. I ask you on the other side of the House, if you are honestly in favor of reducing our expenditures, why not cut off this $350,000?

General Sherman says further, when asked what their business is:

They are for learning the special art of pontooning and laying bridges. In time of actual war engineer troops are very useful, and I have no doubt that these are very fine companies, but they are not subject to military command, and do not perform their share of frontier service. If General Hancock, who commands in New York, were suddenly called upon to defend the harbor, or to assist officers of the internal revenue, he could not call upon these engineer troops to assist him without first getting the consent of the President of the United States or the Secretary of War.

Then I ask you gentlemen, members of this House, who are to vote upon this bill, if you will not decrease this appropriation certainly that amount? General Sherman tells you if you want to reduce, this is the place. He tells you he has no control over them; and who has, and for what purposes are they there?

Again, we see here on page 2 of this bill, from line 17 to line 24, an appropriation of $11,450,000. In seven lines we appropriate over $11,000,000; more than $1,000,000 to a line. Yet the Committee on Appropriations has not had the time, for I know they desire to do their duty, to tell us, in these seven lines, what they are asking nearly $12,000,000 for. Why, what does the report of the Secretary of War show us? Bear in mind that you are appropriating, in round numbers, by this bill $29,000,000 for the Army. You have 26,500 men in the Army. The average pay of the soldier is $13.50 per month, which makes the pay for all the soldiers, in round numbers, $358,000. The amount of their subsistence, as appropriated by this bill, is $2,452,000, the amount for the purchase of their horses is $350,000; making in the aggregate, for the pay of all your soldiers—their monthly pay, their subsistence, the purchase of their horses, all told—only a small fraction over $3,000,000 and yet for the Army you ask an appropriation of $29,000,000.

Have we not, then, the right, gentlemen of the Committee on Appropriations, if you are honestly in favor of reduction and of economy, to ask you to tell the House, and to tell the people, if the pay of your soldiers, if the subsistence of all of them, if the purchase of all of their horses, all added together, only make a little over $3,000,000, why do you want $29,000,000 for your Army? Where is it to go? Have we not a right to ask you to give us the items that are to run up the other $26,000,000? Do not come before the House, do not come before the people, and say you are in favor of economy and reform, when you have appropriated $26,000,000 without giving any reasonable account for what purposes you ask it, or for what purposes you desire it.

I wish I had the time, Mr. Chairman, to go on further, and in this connection to show, when we have by two bills this session appropriated $20,000,000 to the Navy, what General Sherman says on that subject. In this very testimony he tells us that those appropriations for the Navy are immensely too large; that we have no necessity for these forts and arsenals all along the lines of the sea-coast. He says there is no danger of any war-vessel coming into any of our harbors and committing depredations on our shipping. He says there is no vessel in the fleet of the English Channel that could enter more than one of the harbors of the United States, and that is Newport, Rhode Island. He says there is no danger of an invasion from a foreign enemy; from any country—England, France, or Spain. He says, on account of the invention of railroads and telegraphs, that time has passed away. He says that in a few hours you can bring fifteen or twenty thousand soldiers to any point that might be threatened, and thereby defend our country and its flag without these useless appropriations of $20,000,000 for your Navy.

Mr. WHEELER. I yield fifteen minutes to my colleague from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. COX. The other day when my colleague [Mr. WHEELER] was addressing the House on this question he yielded to me, and I addressed to him what I thought a pertinent inquiry, "Why he thought our soldiers cost more per soldier than the English soldiers?" I thought the gentleman could give us an intelligent answer. If our soldiers cost more for their clothing or their food, we might not only learn some lessons of economy with respect to the Army bill but we might be taught an economic lesson as to our imports from abroad and on which we are peculiarly taxed. There was a tax-tariff meaning to my inquiry. I am sure no one will complain for my seeking information to relieve the people. The cost of a soldier here is as three to one, compared with England. Whereas in England a soldier is supported for £100 sterling per annum, or $500, it takes £300 sterling or $1,500 in this country. I do not mean the exact cost of the soldier himself. But take the whole army of England, 130,000, and compare it with our Army, 30,000, and that is the result. It has been ascertained that about $1,000 or a trifle less for each soldier is the cost in this country. Now, why is it that there is such a discrepancy in the expense between England and this country?

I hold in my hand an article from an English paper, the Pall Mall Gazette of December 27, in which the following statement is made:

Our own military establishment, as the reader is aware, comprises a regular army of over 130,000 men, a militia force, the staff of which alone and the stores and buildings occasion a charge all the year round, the men being called out for only a short period, and, lastly, a volunteer force receiving a grant in aid. If we omit the charge on account of the abolition of purchase, the cost of this entire establishment last year was somewhat over £14,500,000. So that for an expenditure about two-thirds of our own the United States obtained an army not nearly one-fourth of ours in number of men, and without an irregular force of any kind to supplement it. * * * To put the matter in a somewhat different light, the entire expenditure of this country last year for military purposes amounted to somewhat more than £100 for each man enrolled; the American expenditure amounted to somewhat more than £300 for each.

This is a matter of economy. It does not concern so much the number of men, perhaps, or their increase or reduction. I am willing to admit that it is doubtful if the reduction of the number of men only is the way to reduce the expense. The 30,000 may all be needed for forts, posts, and stations, although this is doubtful. It is possible, just possible, that a one-sixth reduction of the line would lessen the available strength of the Army, without any proportionate economic gain. But of this hereafter. I am afraid that the actual reduction possible to be considered and made has not been properly considered.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I desire to ask the gentleman one question. Will the gentleman from New York vote to reduce the wages of the American soldier to the wages of the English soldier?

Mr. COX. I propose to reduce the number of soldiers in the Army. I do not belong to the war establishment. I have been for years waiting for the millennium. Ever since I could read I have hoped for the beautiful revelation of the "Prince of Peace." But within the last twenty-five years, and especially since 1855, collisions and wars have not been in the habit of ceasing. A member like the honored soldier from Connecticut arises in the House. He can talk with emphasis. Has he not been a soldier? Has he not been a killer of men, legally? I am one of the quiet, unobtrusive heroes of private life, who votes to cut down your peaceful Army, to make taxes less, and who, so gentle is his regard for the virtues that are not of war, would be willing even that his own wife's relations should do the fighting of the battles of his beloved country. [Laughter.]

But, sir, I tell the soldier of Connecticut that I do not propose to cut down the wages of anybody. I will show him soon where I will cut.

We have three grand divisions of our Army. We have some ten departments, with some 29,000 men or more, nearly 30,000. Some four or five hundred of these are non-combatants. How are these troops distributed? In the Department of the East and Lakes we have 1,826 soldiers; in the Department of the South we have 2,192; in the Gulf States we have 1,021, that is to say, in Louisiana, Arkansas, and Mississippi. Now, I would like to know what those 1,000 soldiers are doing there? We have in Texas (where troops are most needed) 5,109 soldiers. So that there are 12,618 troops outside of the Indian borders, leaving seventeen or eighteen thousand men (17,382) to be distributed along the frontier whose duties I will attend to shortly.

But, first, what are these soldiers doing in the East, on the Lakes, and in the South? What do we want with a thousand men in the Gulf Department? Why, sir, they do not amount to a respectable police force considering the area and population. Do you want them there to prompt or prod citizens to the elections? Do you use them to coerce the people? Is not the civil war ended? Have we not voted amnesty in this House? Why, they are inefficient simply for police. Three hundred men in Mississippi! It is a sham and shame.

As to Louisiana. Louisiana! I would vote for an amendment to this bill that not a dollar shall be given to the Army, or, rather, not a soldier used, not a sword drawn or bayonet fixed, for carrying out the godless tyranny and detestable usurpation in Louisiana. At the proper time I shall offer such a provision in the shape of an additional section to the bill. Sir, the condition of Louisiana is a blazing outrage. The Senate knows it; the House knows it; the President himself knows it; the grangers know it; the very mouth of the Mississippi proclaims it. I will not vote to use our Army for any such illegitimate purpose. We will have a square vote on that. Gentlemen on the other side will find that this Louisiana corruption of court and ballot is very much like "the body of death." It will cling to their party. We have heard of the death of the Siamese twins. I cannot say whether it was Chang or Eng who died first. No matter; when one died the other died very shortly afterward. [Laughter.] Sir, Louisiana is your corpse; it is tied by a ligature to your party. You cannot revivify your party bound by such a vinculum. You will have an opportunity to vote on the Louisiana case before the Army bill is passed; and in your votes you will read what Chang saw in Eng's death.

Do we want an army for purposes of foreign war? Is there any danger of war upon the Canadian border? If there was, one hundred thousand men from my own State would leap to defend and hold that border. Do you fear war with Spain? One hundred thousand men could be raised in any State South—rebels, ay rebels—ready to rally to the old ensign to defend the country in that direction.

But, sir, there is no imminent danger of a collision with Spain or any other foreign power. Our diplomacy is so complaisant! It has smiles so ready that it can smile down any formidable attack upon us. It is all suaviter, and not any fortiter. It is true that our Navy is weak; but see the proud emblem of our diplomacy! It stands out of the waves off the North Carolina coast, the noble mizzen-mast of the Virginius. It is the emblem of our national diplomacy, strength, and honor. [Laughter.] Mars hath no wrinkled front that our courteous Secretary of State cannot wreath in sweetest smiles. Our diplomacy is our shield and buckler. We have no such allies against foreign aggression and insult.

Is there any other danger of foreign war? We will see.

Wars are of uncertain occurrence. During the last twenty years we have seen Italy made one by the war between Italy and Austria; and the war of the Crimea between France, Russia, and England; and the Franco-German war. No such wars are recorded by Hume to show the populousness and belligerency of the ancient nations. We have had our own great civil war; we have had our great Modoc war, [laughter;] and all these wars indicate that wars may come on the "occasion sudden." When they do come fifteen thousand men are just as good a skeleton or nucleus for an army as thirty thousand, and not half so expensive.

Unless gentlemen can show some pressing emergency for 30,000 men, there is no reason why the proposition hereafter to be made by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, may not be adopted, and our rank and file be cut down, and even the salaries of the colonels and generals cut down also.

As to the Indians: In 1860 we had them not on reservations, therefore their warlike alliances were easier. Our border was not so great, nor were our Indians so small in number, or so costly as now. Now it costs eight or nine millions for them, aside from the Army expenses. Besides we can call on the well-skilled border-men to fight them, and thus save money and men.

But, Mr. Chairman, these questions seem to have aroused some gentlemen from the West to speak against the State of New York. My honored friend from Oregon [Mr. NESMITH] spoke wittily, if not wisely. He said:

Why, sir, if this policy is to be pursued, and our country is not to be permitted to extend because of the appropriation of money required to be made by Congress for the protection of our frontiers, why not extend it to the civilized portion of the country as well as to our western frontiers, whence you derive all of your metallic currency to-day? Why not extend it to New York? More money is asked in the way of appropriation for the defense of the city of New York to-day than for the defense of the entire frontier. I would ask the gentleman from New York, why not move that city up above the Highlands of the Hudson; stretch across the river the old chain they had in the days of the Revolution, and abandon the place which to-day requires such large appropriations for its defense?

My friend complains that gentlemen wanted to confine the boundaries of civilization and to confine them to New York. He made that charge against my colleague who reported this bill, [Mr. WHEELER,] who is himself a frontiersman of the State; and yet the gentleman from Oregon, for some fancied embarrassment to his section, proposed to shut up the harbor of New York, to abandon the place, because it might require some appropriations for its defense. I think it was one of the Stuarts who proposed to move London. The city authorities begged his royal highness to let the Thames flow on. It flows to-day. New York City will live, though every Modoc is in glory!

The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. NESMITH] should have examined the facts in relation to New York. New York City holds Oregon as a suburb, and yet the city costs the country little or nothing—$40,000 was appropriated last year for Fort Hamilton; $30,000 for Fort Tompkins; $29,000 for the Hudson Battery; making $99,000; and for torpedoes, to be used generally in all our harbors, only $300,000. Therefore there have been no considerable sums expended for New York—nothing like what it costs for Indian and Army contracts, to say nothing of Quaker and other luxuries. The defense of New York City costs nothing compared with the large and expensive Indian frontier. Therefore there is no meaning in the attack made by my pious friend from Oregon.

The gentleman must remember that the city of New York is the gate-way of the country. When he would shut up that harbor, remove it up the river, and place a chain across the Hudson, he forgets what New York is. There is not a mean fiber in its polity. It is generous to all the world, and especially to Oregon and Indians. New York City, with its population of 942,292, its 64,044 dwellings, and its three and a half billions of values, its tonnage of sailing-vessels and steamships, amounting to 1,046,118,021 tons, is not to be chained up the Hudson without a hearing! New York City pays 67 per cent. of all the customs dues collected in this country. Please cipher that! Total receipts of the United States from customs, not including fines, penalties, and forfeitures, gold, $188,089,522.70. In the port of New York alone, of this sum, is collected $126,824,899.92. Besides, she pays $12,405,768.75 of internal-revenue tax. Is that nothing to boast of? It is enough to buy up Oregon, Indians and all.

She is in all matters equal to her position, as the grand metropolis. Shut her in with chains, as she is now by bad commercial restrictions and worse officials—pshaw! She will break forth in charities and in goodness. May I ask once and forever, to settle the slanders upon the great city by giving a few of the statistics of our proud metropolis?

The prisons, hospitals, asylums, almshouses, nurseries, &c., numbering twenty-seven institutions, received 153,271 subjects in 1873. The department for the out-door poor gave relief to 22,782 persons. The amount of money expended in sustaining the operations of the commissioners of public charities and corrections during the year was $1,206,358.85. And you want this chained in? The organized local charitable societies and institutions receive and disburse annually $2,500,000. The total expense of the commissioners of emigration during the year was $592,437.03. Yet you would send these benefactions inland, where there would be no beneficiaries?

The receipts of the daily press in New York are said to be $9,000,000 annually. Do they not reach us here? For the theaters, operas, and other public amusements, the people of New York spend $7,000,000 a year. The system of public instruction costs $3,000,000 a year. To sustain the churches of all denominations $3,000,000 are required.

The money expended in the 8,403 liquor-shops is estimated at not less than $38,000,000. [Laughter.] Perhaps the gentleman objects to that.

The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. NESMITH] intimated that there was not water enough out in Oregon to baptize the Indian converts made by the good missionaries there. Well, New York City can furnish him with water enough; for we consume each day 104,000,000 gallons, three times as much per month as in London; enough to float any of these great steamships over any New York bar referred to by my friend [Mr. HEREFORD] a moment ago.

Therefore, in any element of greatness, goodness, charity, or wealth! New York City is the indispensable and superb epitome of the country, What a small amount we spend in her defense I shall hereafter have occasion to show.

Now, in regard to the Indian business, I was about to show that we could safely trust it with fewer soldiers than we now have, say 20,000. Major Powell last year went through sixty-six tribes unharmed and took their census. I am informed that in distant Washington Territory one can go anywhere among the tribes safely. I know that some of the "bucks" of the Sioux, Arapahoes, and other tribes sometimes go on the war-path. There may be some 3,000 troublesome Indians in all.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHEELER. I want to do my colleague [Mr. COX] the courtesy to reply to a question which, with all his experience in this body, he must have known to be entirely irrelevant. He knows very well that the Committee on Appropriations have no power whatever to change the pay of a soldier. All our appropriations are made in accordance with existing laws. And the gentleman knows as well as I do that the difference between the cost of American soldiers and the cost of English soldiers grows out of the two items of pay and transportation. The English soldier receives only about one-half of the pay of the American soldier.

Mr. COX. Yes; our soldier costs nearly three times what the English soldier receives. I know, too, we must change existing law in order to decrease appropriations. I understand that perfectly. Who undertakes to do that?

Mr. WHEELER. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GUNCKEL] for twenty-five minutes.

Mr. COX. I wish to say one word in response to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. COX. Then I will quit. [Laughter.]

The committee rose informally, and Mr. MAYNARD took the chair as Speaker pro tempore in order to receive a MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a joint resolution of the House, of the following title:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 43) authorizing a special court of inquiry concerning General O. O. Howard.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, and requested the concurrence of the House in, a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. No. 417) relating to certain deposits in the Post-Office Department.

The message also announced that the Senate insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House to the resolution of the House of Representatives, directing the Congressional Printer to furnish each Senator and each Member and Delegate in the House of Representatives twenty-four copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and had agreed to the conference requested by the House upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. ANTHONY, Mr. HOWE, and Mr. SAULSBURY.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. GUNCKEL. When I first took my seat in this House I was informed by one of my seniors that new members, like good children at a well-regulated family table, were expected to be seen, not heard. I have remembered and obeyed the injunction, and for two months have not presumed on even a five-minutes' speech. And I am reluctant to take the floor now. But the Speaker was pleased to place me on the Committee on Military Affairs; not because I had military knowledge or experience, for I had neither, but, I presume, on the principle upon which jurymen are selected—because I had not formed or expressed an opinion upon any subject which by any possibility could come before the committee. One of the first duties placed upon this committee by the House was "to inquire into the expediency of reducing the regular Army," with power to send for persons and papers. The committee has been steadily at this work for three weeks past, during which time they have examined the Secretary of War, the General and Lieutenant-General of the Army, the department commanders, inspector-generals, the Adjutant-General, Quartermaster-General, Chief of Ordnance, and many other officers in high rank, together with the Secretary of the Interior, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and several of the commissioners, inspectors, and agents of the Indian Bureau. Two hundred pages of this testimony have been printed and laid upon the tables of members, and probably as much more is in the hands of the printer.

It is fair to say that I entered upon this investigation with an earnest conviction that, in view of the falling off of the revenues and a probable deficit of $40,000,000, it was the imperative duty of Congress to initiate and rigorously carry out a radical system of economy in each and every department of the Government. I did not believe it right to borrow money or increase the taxes, but I believed the Government should follow the example of thousands of its best citizens who had, during the past winter, solved for themselves the same problem. When they found their incomes falling off they at once made a corresponding reduction in their expenses, and so prudently and sensibly managed to live within their incomes, or, in homely phrase, "to cut their coats according to their cloth."

We have been favored with many eloquent speeches on "retrenchment and reform." We have resolved over and over that we would economize, but we don't do it. We seem to be for economy theoretically, but not practically; for economy somewhere else, but not here; for economy some other time, but not now. The head of each Department thinks retrenchment well enough in general, but not possible in his particular case. We must not touch the Army or the Navy, or refuse the usual appropriations for the State, Treasury, and Interior Departments, and yet we are expected to reduce the appropriations in the sum of $40,000,000. Where and how? "Stop all buildings," says the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ALBRIGHT.] But where shall we begin? With the Boston post-office? I fear even our worthy leader would not want retrenchment to come so near home. With the New York post-office and custom-house? The Representative of the Empire City, [Mr. COX,] who talks so eloquently of republican extravagance and democratic economy, has just argued that theirs is an exceptional case. Washington City is another exceptional case, and liberal appropriations are expected. Indeed, I notice they are all exceptional cases. Even Pennsylvania herself will hardly want retrenchment and reform to stand in the way of an appropriation of four or five millions for the Centennial Exhibition. And my good friends from the first and second districts of Ohio, who have steadily voted with me in the straight line of economy, suddenly deserted when a bill seemed to touch the Cincinnati post-office. It is all well enough so long as it is your ox that is gored, but beware if it be mine!

The emergency demands of us that we lay aside for the time being all personal and local considerations, and inaugurate a rigid system of practical economy, which shall apply, not to this or that place only, but everywhere, and which shall begin, not at a more convenient season, but here and now. This Army bill (thanks to the Committee on Appropriations) is in the right direction, and ought to receive the support of this House, as it certainly will of the country.

The original estimates were $34,881,618.10. This bill appropriates $28,448,916.60, being $6,432,701.50 less than the original estimates, and $2,605,001.71 less than was appropriated for the same purposes last year.

But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALBRIGHT] says:

This appropriation bill strikes a blow in the dark. It withholds the bread and clothing and pay for the present force of enlisted men, but it does not determine upon whom or what branch of the Army its decimating and blighting touch shall fall.

My distinguished friend is for once very much mistaken. It strikes a blow at nobody. It does not touch a single officer or man in the Army. It does not withhold bread, or clothing, or pay from a single man in the present force. It simply proposes to stop enlistments until there shall be a reduction of 5,000 from the present force of the Army; that is, instead of recruiting 12,000 next year, only 7,000 shall be recruited, and in anticipation of having a less number to feed and clothe, reduces the appropriation for said purposes. The Secretary of War was consulted as to these reductions, and in how far he agreed to them may be seen by the following extracts from his testimony before the Military Committee, (see pages 61 and 62:)

Mr. GUNCKEL. House bill No. 1009, reported from the Committee on Appropriations, seems to make an appropriation of about $6,430,000 less than your estimates. I want to know whether these reductions are with or without your concurrence.

Secretary BELKNAP. My original estimate for the Army proper, including ordnance and ordnance stores, and for the engineer depot at Willet's Point, and for medical and hospital supplies, was $33,093,716.60. On examination afterward I reduced that to $32,768,716.60. Afterward, in connection with one of the members of the House Committee on Appropriations, I agreed to a further reduction to $29,126,716.60. That reduction was mainly in ordnance and ordnance stores, and infantry, cavalry, and artillery equipments.

The CHAIRMAN. Was any of it made in view of the reduction of the Army?

Secretary BELKNAP. That last reduction was agreed to by me, on consultation with the member of the House Committee on Appropriations, as a sufficient amount, provided a reduction of the Army was insisted upon; in other words, that last appropriation of $29,126,716.60, has reference to a reduction of the Army and the cessation of recruiting. * * * * * *

Mr. GUNCKEL. What I want to know is, whether you agreed as to what extent the Army should be reduced.

Secretary BELKNAP. No, sir. It was simply that the recruiting service would be stopped gradually, and that the places of the men who gradually fall out of the Army should not be filled. I did not advise or agree to this beyond stating that if the Army was to be reduced, this amount would be sufficient.

It would seem from this that the actual reduction in the appropriation because of the proposed reduction in the Army is comparatively a small portion of the whole. And for a manifest reason. The Army now numbers 31,040. Its reduction by expiration of service and ordinary casualties will be gradual, so that for a good portion of the year there would be no appreciable reduction in pay, subsistence, clothing, &c. But next year it will show a saving of $5,000,000. Adjutant-General Townsend says that the calculation as to what each soldier costs, making it about $1,000 per year, was made five years ago. He has made none since. When he shall do so, it will be found that the amount is nearer $1,200, and if so the cost per year of 5,000 men and the actual saving made by this bill would be $6,000,000. But, "What's a few millions?" says the distinguished democratic Representative from Oregon, [Mr. NESMITH.] Well, it would be a good deal if it came out of our own pockets, and we ought to be just as particular about spending it as if it were actually our own. By the way, I have been astonished to find my democratic friends so generally opposing this bill and any reduction in the Army and in favor of giving the Secretary of War all the money he wants. I thought the democratic party, from Thomas Jefferson down, had a wholesome dread of a standing army. I thought they objected (and not without reason) to the expense of maintaining so large a military force in the South. I thought they complained of the extravagance of the Administration and were trying to bring us back to the simplicity and economy of the early days of the Republic. Were all their beautiful professions in the last campaign mere "sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal?"

It is an ungracious task to criticise one's own party or friends. But criticism is always wholesome; and if the opposition will not, we must. The honorable gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] compared the Army to a manufacturer. I am glad to have the Army brought, and by a military man himself, to a comparison with ordinary, every-day business transactions. Said General Sherman, "Army officers are not expected to know anything of economy; if economy be necessary, Congress must order it." And the Secretary of War told us that each "department commander wants as much (money) for his own department as he can get." And, said one of the most distinguished of the major-generals of the Army, the other day, "I believe that if the whole war establishment were reorganized on sound business principles, and conducted with the good common sense and practical economy shown in every-day life, the total expenses could be cut down one-third, and so make a saving of, say, $10,000,000 annually." Following up the illustration given, what would a shrewd Hartford manufacturer do if he found his revenues decreasing and retrenchment necessary? Among other means, he would carefully scrutinize his own expenditures, item by item, compare them with similar expenses of his neighbors, and endeavor so to discover where and how he could reduce his own. Let us apply the same principle to the Army.

I have in my hands the book of estimates of the English army establishment for 1873, and I beg the attention of the House to a comparison of some of the principal items of expenditure. For convenience, I take the amounts as reduced to dollars and cents in an article I found in the Cincinnati Commercial. I have compared the figures and believe them to be correct:

EXPENSES OF ENGLISH AND AMERICAN ARMIES COMPARED.

The total cost of the military establishment of Great Britain for the current year 1873-'74, including pensions, militia establishment, and all, aggregates £14,416,400, or a little over $70,000,000. And what does Great Britain get in return for this expenditure? She gets an effective regular army, numbering 128,968 men, besides the militia force, volunteer corps, and army reserve, which aggregate over 300,000 men additional. The British army contains no less than one hundred and nine regiments of infantry, (we have twenty-five,) twenty-one regiments of cavalry, (we have ten,) besides several of artillery and engineers. This army is distributed throughout the United Kingdom and the colonies. England, as is well known, is one of the most expensive of civilized nations. Let us compare a few of the leading items of expenditure in the military establishment of both countries. The following table shows the expenditure for 1864 in the United States and Great Britain:

Object.	United States.	Great Britain.
Military schools	$338,351	$669,500
Ordnance and arms	3,299,530	5,350,000
Subsistence department	2,852,416	3,015,985
Quartermaster's department	15,635,000	10,602,080
Pay of army	12,300,000	25,352,660
Public works	4,600,454	3,890,250
War department	818,930	1,002,600

The comparison, I am pained to say, is not favorable to the United States. It seems that an English soldier costs the government about $540 per year, and ours more than twice that much. As will be seen by the printed testimony, General Sheridan and Adjutant-General Townsend explain the difference by saying that our soldiers are better paid, better fed, and better clothed than the English. Assuming the facts stated to be correct, it accounts for a part of the difference, but hardly for the whole. Clothing is cheaper, but food must be dearer in England than in the United States, and yet it took nearly as much for us to feed our 30,000 men as for Great Britain to feed her 129,000. In other words, it takes more than four times as much to feed an American as an English soldier. Again, in the matter of army transportation, Great Britain, with all her colonies, paid only $1,300,000 for transportation, while the United States paid $4,500,000, being more than three times as much for our Army of 30,000, as for the English army of 129,000. And our Military Academy costs $330,000 per annum, while the six English academies, namely, Woodward Military Academy, Sandhurst Military College, Sandhurst Staff College, Royal Military Asylum and School, Royal Hibernian School, and Military Medical School, cost only $669,500 per annum, an average of a little over $100,000 each, so that, in proportion to the size of our Army, we pay about twice as much for military education as Great Britain.

In what I have said or may say on this subject, I distinctly disclaim any intention of reflecting in the slightest degree on the Secretary of War or General of the Army. I hold them both in the highest esteem. If a mere civilian may venture an opinion, I think the Army establishment unnecessarily expensive; but for that neither is justly responsible; it is the usual—and it would seem the inevitable—result of a great war. The General of the Army has nothing to do with the expenditure of money; and the Secretary of War has, during his term of office, largely reduced the expenses of his Department, and shown a commendable determination to continue the work of retrenchment and reform.

But to return. Shall the Army be reduced? Army officers say no. But as the Constitution has left this question, not to the officers of the Army, but to Congress, it would seem both our right and duty to examine the reasons given for the opinion so expressed.

The enlisted men of the Army, according to the report of the Adjutant-General under date of January 26, 1873, numbers 31,021. The act of July 15, 1870, (see Statutes at Large, volume 16, page 317,) provides—

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, on or before the 1st day of July, 1871, to reduce the number of enlisted men in the Army to 30,000; and thereafter there shall be no more than 30,000 enlisted men in the Army at any one time, unless otherwise authorized by law.

This language is clear, imperative. By what authority, then, has the Army been increased to 31,021? The Adjutant-General says it was caused by the return of deserters under the President's proclamation. But I beg to ask whether the President, by a proclamation, can change a law of Congress, and so increase the Army at will? But whether with or without authority, the fact remains that the Army numbers 31,021. But we are told, and authoritatively, that the "fighting force" is only 21,040. Where are the other 10,000? Some 500 are in the civil service; but why there, unless because they are not really needed in the military service? Congress directed that all the Army bands but one should be discontinued; but the inspector-generals testified before the Military Committee that each regiment had a band, made by a detail of twenty men for that purpose. This would make in forty regiments a detail of 800 men, and just so many withdrawn from the "fighting force" of the Army—presumably because they were not needed.

But these are the very questions upon which we took testimony, and I beg the attention of the House to the same.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. GUNCKEL. Certainly.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Under the act of July 28, 1866, is there not authority to employ one thousand Indian scouts? And are they not embraced in this thirty-one thousand?

Mr. GUNCKEL. They are not so included. I have examined that point. There are thirty-one thousand in addition to the Indian scouts.

Mr. HURLBUT. Will the gentleman answer one question?

Mr. GUNCKEL. If I can I will.

Mr. HURLBUT. I would ask whether, in the English estimate which the gentleman has quoted, in regard to the cost of the individual English soldier, the cost of the sea-coast defenses of the country is included?

Mr. GUNCKEL. They are not included in either estimate.

Mr. HURLBUT. They are included in our estimates.

Mr. GUNCKEL. They are not in either estimate, as I understand. The gentleman will find by any figuring he can make (I have figured it out very many times in very many ways) that the cost of an English soldier is only about one-half the cost of an American soldier. Our soldiers may be better fed, better clothed, and better paid, and whether that accounts for the fact I will leave the House to determine.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I would remind the gentleman that a suit of clothes costs twice as much in Ohio as in England, and probably there is a corresponding difference in the cost of everything necessary to support a soldier, as well as a corresponding difference in pay.

Mr. GUNCKEL. I have admitted that clothing is dearer in this country than in England. I have admitted that this accounts in part for the increased cost of maintaining our soldiers. I have admitted also that the pay of our soldiers is greater; and whether these circumstances sufficiently explain the fact that it costs twice as much to maintain a soldier in this country as it does in England I leave the House to determine.

The distinguished officers who appeared before the committee agreed that the Army was at present needed for three special purposes:

1. To protect the public property at the several fortifications on the lakes and sea-coast.

2. To keep peace in the South.

3. To protect the white settlers in the Territories, and hold the Indians in proper subjugation.

Let us examine these in the light of the testimony:

1. To protect the public property at the several fortifications on the lakes and sea-coast.

The Secretary of War, when before the Military Committee, is asked by—

The CHAIRMAN. What is the military necessity of keeping troops stationed along the line of the lakes?

Secretary BELKNAP. There is no immediate military necessity for it at the present moment. The First Infantry is stationed on the northern lakes, stretched out, a few troops at one point and a few troops at another, like Fort Wayne, for instance, near Detroit. If that regiment were withdrawn, and a few men left there to take care of the public property, no great damage would ensue, of course, at present.

And General Sherman, page 10, says:

I come now to the Second Artillery. It occupies the sea-coast forts from Charleston north as far as and including Fort McHenry, at Baltimore, with detachments in the interior at Raleigh and some other points in North Carolina, being shifted about there subject to the requisitions of the marshal of the district. These forts are, in my judgment, with the exception of Forts Monroe and McHenry, useless. Take, for instance, Fort Macon and Fort Johnson on the coast of North Carolina. They are perfectly useless, for there is no channel at these points that war-vessels could make use of.

On our sea-board, my judgment has always been that we occupy too many little insignificant posts called forts or batteries, which might as well be washed into the sea, and the quicker the better. There are a great many arsenals, over which I have no control, which in my mind are worse than useless.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Did not General McDowell testify before the committee that he had reduced the posts in the South to fourteen, thereby saving to the Government $200,000 during the last year, and that at this time it would not be safe for the best interests of the country to withdraw our troops altogether from that department? Is not that the testimony of General McDowell, who is in command of that department?

Mr. GUNCKEL. I did not hear the testimony of General McDowell, and it has not yet been printed. If he has made such a reduction as the gentleman mentions he has done well; and if he makes a further reduction by withdrawing the rest of the military force from there he will do better.

Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia. I would remind the gentleman that General McDowell further stated that there was nothing in the present condition of the South causing a need for troops there; that there is as much reason to expect Massachusetts to secede as any Southern State.

Mr. GUNCKEL. As I stated before, I did not hear the testimony of General McDowell; no doubt the honorable gentleman from Georgia quotes it correctly.

Inspector-General Absalom Baird, of the United States Army, testifies thus:

Question. I see that in the Department of the East there are 1,826 soldiers. In view of the works to be occupied there and of the frontier to be guarded, and in view of the absence of hostile forces in the neighborhood, do you think that 1,826 soldiers are necessary?

Answer. No, sir. If there were trouble in Florida or Texas to-morrow, the soldiers could be withdrawn from the Department of the East and sent there. I believe the engineers would rather not have soldiers in the fortifications.

Q. Aside from the engineer force that is required to keep forts in repair and to protect them from damage by intruders, can the military force now in those forts be dispensed with?

A. Yes; I think so.

Q. I see that in the Department of the Lakes there are 2,470 soldiers. State whether there is any military necessity to have those soldiers there.

A. There is only one post on the lakes that I know of which it is necessary at the present time to keep for military reasons. That is the post at Sault Saint Marie. It is necessary in order to protect the canal, which would be liable to be depredated upon by vicious people. That is the only post in the Department of the Lakes where I suppose troops to be necessary, except with a view of keeping a police force on the Canadian frontier. That is a question of civil politics, and not one for military consideration.

2. To keep peace in the South.

For this purpose there are now in the Department of the South 2,192 men, and in the Department of the Gulf 3,223 men; total, 5,415. Are they needed? I might ask the Southern Representatives around me; but let us see what the officers of the Army themselves say:

Secretary Belknap, page 57, is asked by—

The CHAIRMAN. What, if any, is the military necessity of keeping troops in the South—in any part of the States recently in rebellion?

Secretary BELKNAP. Troops have been gradually withdrawn from the South, and I am very much in favor of withdrawing the remaining portion as rapidly as possible. In my judgment there is no great necessity for keeping the troops stationed there much longer. It is possible that in some localities their retention may be necessary for awhile in the opinion of some gentlemen who reside in that part of the country, and who occasionally remonstrate against their removal; but my candid opinion is that it is quite time to withdraw the troops from there, and they can be made use of elsewhere.

And General Sherman, page 17, says:

The Eighteenth Infantry is in South Carolina. I have been very anxious to get that regiment out, but every time we attempt to move it influence of some kind or other is brought to bear to prevent its being moved. They say the regiment is necessary there. Its headquarters are at Columbia, South Carolina, with some companies at Yorkville and Newberry, South Carolina, and Atlanta, Georgia.

Mr. GUNCKEL. What is the necessity of keeping that regiment there?

General SHERMAN. I guess that politics has something to do with it. They say that the regiment is needed there. The marshals of the districts and the members of Congress from the State say so.

Mr. GUNCKEL. What has the regiment had to do there?

General SHERMAN. Nothing at all, except that it is said that its presence there assures peace.

And Inspector-General Baird is asked by the chairman the following:

Question. I see that by the last report of the Adjutant-General there were 3,223 soldiers in the Department of the Gulf, and 2,192 in the Department of the South. Is there any military necessity at present for the presence of troops in that region?

Answer. There is no military necessity for it that I am aware of.

In the light of this testimony can there be much doubt but that, from the Departments of the East, the Lakes, the South, and the Gulf, where there are now nearly 10,000 men, 5,000 might, without detriment to the service, be withdrawn during the coming year? For it must be remembered that the decrease from 31,000 to 26,000 will be by casualties and expiration of service merely, and so gradual and comparatively slow. And is there any doubt, from the opinion given by the Secretary of War and the General of the Army, that the first troops withdrawn will be from the South, and that the whole reduction can and will be made without withdrawing a single man from the Indian country?

3. To protect the white people in the Territories, and hold the Indians in proper subjection.

I learn that ten regiments of cavalry and fourteen regiments of infantry—say 11,000 men—are now so employed. The officers of the Army say this force is necessary. They may be right; it is not for me to say otherwise. But there are two sides to the question. The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALBRIGHT] has given the one side, and I propose, in common fairness, to give the other, leaving the House to decide between them.

Felix R. Brunot, chairman of the board of Indian commissioners, and known to the country as a man of high character and undoubted probity, and who during the five years past has visted the Indians in Montana, Colorado, the Indian Territory, Idaho, Washington, Oregon, California, and along the Pacific Railroad, says, (see page 148:)

Without any experience in regard to the Indians of Arizona and Texas, I must say that I do not know of any tribe of Indians that is not at present friendly to the United States. Some of the wilder tribes, as the Sioux, and probably the Kiowas, Comanches, and Cheyennes, and Arapahoes, have individuals who are unfriendly to the whites; but as to tribes, I believe they are all friendly to the white people.

And again, on page 149:

Question. State whether you think any military posts that are in the neighborhood of Indian tribes can be dispensed with.

Answer. I have no doubt that there are some that can be dispensed with.

Q. What posts are those?

A. There are two posts in California, at Indian reservations, from which we had reports two years ago, showing that the presence of military there was a serious detriment both to the Indians and the whites. One or them is at Round Valley reservation, and is called Fort Gaston. The other is in Hoopa Valley.

And General G. W. Ingalls, who has been acting as a special Indian commissioner, for the purpose of examining into the condition of Indians in Idaho, Utah, Nevada, and Southeastern California, when before the committee, (see page 142,) answers thus:

Mr. GUNCKEL. If I understand you, then, in your opinion, in all that territory the presence of United States troops is not necessary to protect the Indians from the whites, or the whites from the Indians?

Answer. That is my candid opinion. I conversed, while in Nevada, with several members of the Nevada Legislature, with merchants, with men of property, rancheros, and stock-raisers, and I base my opinion on these conversations in stating that there is not any necessity for military; and they confirmed me in the opinion, which I had already formed, that the influence of troops among the Indians was demoralizing, and that there were more frequent troubles arising between the Indians and the settlers when the troops were in their midst than there are at present. There are but very few troops around the large body of those Indians.

Major J. W. Powell, who was sent by the Smithsonian Institution to study the Indian languages and prepare grammars and dictionaries of them, and lived among the Indians for six years, visiting one hundred and twenty different tribes, was called before the committee. I submit portions of his testimony, page 133:

The CHAIRMAN. State the disposition of those Indians toward the whites—whether mischievous, hostile, or friendly.

Major POWELL. All of those Indians are at present friendly, and all of those, excepting the Indians in Colorado, are anxious to become farmers, and are begging for land and cattle, and are accumulating cattle.

The CHAIRMAN. What is their capacity for mischief? Are the settlers able to take care of themselves?

Major POWELL. They are, except as to those Indians in Colorado. With the others there is no trouble at all. The presence of the troops among them is bad. In the first place the troops are a standing menace to the Indians. Then the Indians have a vast horror of troops, not so much on account of their being fighting-men as on account of their introducing diseases among them. * * * * * *

Mr. YOUNG. How many of these Indians are in a state of hostility to the Government?

Major POWELL. None of them whatever.

And again, on page 136:

Mr. HUNTON. Do I understand you to say that, in your opinion, the marshals of those several districts, with power to call on a posse comitatus, would keep the peace and administer justice better between the whites and Indians than the Army does?

Major POWELL. I think so.

Mr. HUNTON. At comparatively less cost?

Major POWELL. Yes.
Mr. HUNTON. You cannot form an estimate of the difference of the cost?
Major POWELL. I cannot; I should say, in a very general way, that it would not cost one-tenth as much.

I will add but one more, although others testified to the same effect. J. D. Bevier, United States Indian inspector, who has recently been among the Indians of Colorado and Wyoming, is asked, (see page 201:)

So far as you can judge from your own stand-point, as a civilian and inspector, can you express any opinion as to the necessity for a military force near these tribes?
Answer. There is no use for any military near them, and the presence of military will do harm. The Indians feel restless, uneasy, and disturbed by the presence of soldiers. They have a dread of them. They have confidence in their agents, and look to them for advice and direction. They feel secure and comfortable and satisfied in the absence of military.

But it is charged that these are interested witnesses. Possibly they are, but to no greater extent than Army officers. It might be prudent to take both with some allowance. But are the settlers and frontiersmen wholly disinterested? I will let a regular Army officer, Inspector-General N. H. Davis, answer:

Question. Do you think that many of those posts are established by personal or political influence, aside from the judgment of military men?
Answer. I think such influences are exerted and have their effect.
Q. And for local profit?
A. And for local reasons oftentimes. I would mention Fort Benton, where I was last year; that post is unfit for anybody to live in. * * * There is no necessity for this post, in my opinion, and I think the removal of the post has been recommended by General Sheridan. The town of Benton is a small village, whose population varies from perhaps a few scores in summer to a few hundred in winter. There are a few merchants and traders in furs and traders with the Indians; but there are many adventurers and venders of bad whisky; they are, as reported, a whisky-drinking and rather lawless kind of people. They want the troops there because it gives them a sort of protection against Indians, who come in there and get drunk sometimes, as stated; and it gives them a certain traffic from the soldiers, who spend their money there more or less. One man there, as I was informed, said he would be willing to subscribe fifty dollars to keep the troops there, and that he could afford to do so from his little earnings. The citizens, I understood, petitioned to keep the troops there. I believe the object is for the purpose of putting a few dollars in their own pockets. I do not think the troops are necessary in the interest of the General Government.

In answer to the violent assault upon the peace policy of the Government, I beg to read an extract from the report (just published) of the board of Indian commissioners:

The temper and disposition of the wild tribes has been steadily improving, and there is no reason to doubt that a continuance of just and humane treatment will soon bring them under perfect control and submissive to all reasonable requirements of the Government. Several of these tribes have been earnestly soliciting for the promised schools and other appliances of civilization which they so lately abhorred, and they cannot understand why they should be so long delayed, and others who have never before consented are now asking for a reservation and agency.
The partially civilized tribes have made good progress during the year, and the reports in our office show that wherever the Christian churches have had their missionaries at work their labors have been amply rewarded.

The high Christian character of Felix R. Brunot and his worthy associates will be a sufficient guarantee that the statements here made are strictly and absolutely true; and the good work thus being done will commend still more strongly to the Christian people of this country and the world the peace policy of the Government, not only for the just and successful solution of the Indian problem, but also for the amicable settlement of all international disputes.

The distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] objects to this bill because it begins at the foot, and not the head, of the Army; that Congress ought to reduce the number of officers rather than the number of privates. It matters little where we begin, so we do really begin somewhere; and because we begin at the foot, there is no reason why we should end there, or until we have reached the head also. If we reduce the Army 5,000, Army officers themselves think we should reduce the number of officers.

The Secretary of War says, page 61:

With the present organization of the Army, in companies and regiments, the present number of officers is necessary for the management of the Army. In my judgment, if the Army is to be reduced, there should be a reduction of privates as well as officers, and of officers as well as privates; that is, if it is to be an actual reduction of the Army. I think that if you cut off 5,000 men, the officers for 5,000 should also be cut off.
Mr. GUNCKEL. Would it be practicable to leave the number of men as it is and consolidate regiments, and in that way reduce the number of officers?
Secretary BELKNAP. O, yes; it could be done in that way. There could be a consolidation.
The CHAIRMAN. Can the number of men be managed by a less number of officers, if regiments are consolidated?
Secretary BELKNAP. Yes, sir.

And General Sherman says:

If reduction is forced upon the Army by the financial condition of the country, (of which Congress must be the sole judge,) I unhesitatingly say that you had better cut off at the head than at the foot; that the most valuable part of our military establishment is in the inverse order of its general arrangement. I look upon two calvary regiments, or even infantry regiments, as worth more than the whole general staff, myself included. I would rather see Congress abolish me and my office, and turn me loose to get my own living, and tear out the first thirty-eight pages of the Army Register, than to see it disband two such regiments.

And speaking of the law preventing promotions in certain Departments of the Army, the General says:

The Ordnance Department now seeks to obtain the same repeal as to itself. In my judgment there is not a bit of necessity for such favoritism. They have got plenty of ordnance officers for every probable contingency that can arise in the next year.
Mr. HAWLEY, of Illinois. The President, in his message, speaks of it.
General SHERMAN. Yes; because he is very much pressed by mothers and aunts who want to get their sons and nephews into some soft place. The Ordnance Department is the softest place in the Army, and they all want to get into it, especially young men with influential congressional friends. I may as well use plain language. There are sixty-one ordnance officers now, and how they find employment for them all I don't know.

Inspector-General Baird, in his testimony, says:

But if Congress should find it necessary to make a reduction, I think the best way to begin would be by declaring that the vacancies which now exist (among the officers) should not be filled.

There are now in the Army 2,378 officers, being about one to each twelve men. With the proposed reduction you would have one officer to each ten men, while in the English army there is only one officer to twenty men.

The Paymaster-General reports that there was last year paid to officers $4,086,551.91; to enlisted men $4,080,124.53; being $6,427.38 more paid to officers than enlisted men. But this does not include the amounts paid officers for quarters, fuel, forage, increased allowances, &c. The difference will be partially shown in the subjoined tables; the first column showing the mere pay, included in above amount, and the other the additional allowances added thereto:

Table of pay allowed by law.

Inspector-General Baird suggested that the best way to begin would be to declare that the vacancies which now exist should not be filled. Why not?

But some of these vacancies may have been filled by nominations sent to Senate but not confirmed, say 250.

Assuming that the casualties will be about the same for the coming as the last year, and we would have 250 vacancies. These running from colonel to second lieutenant would average at least $2,000 per year, which would be a saving of $500,000 annually, and that without cutting off one single officer now in the service. Why not do it, and by an amendment to this very bill? But it would be "ungracious and ungenerous," cries the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ALBRIGHT.] "Generous" with our own money? O, no; but with other people's money. I do not comprehend that sort of generosity, and prefer to be just to my constituents rather than generous to anybody in that sort of way.

One other abuse, it seems to me, ought to be corrected, and possibly in this bill. I refer to the enormous amounts paid for quarters, &c., at the headquarters of the several military divisions and departments of the Army. I subjoin the special report of the acting Quartermaster-General to the Military Committee on the subject:

In reference to the expenditure by the Quartermaster's Department on account of the Signal Corps of the Army, it is estimated at $123,325 per annum.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. D. BINGHAM,
Acting Quartermaster-General, Brevet Brigadier-General, U. S. A.

Hon. JOHN COBURN,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs House of Representatives.

Note that $62,616 are paid for officers' quarters in the city of Washington. On further inquiry, I find that eight brigadier-generals and sixteen colonels have quarters, each of which costs the Government $2,160 annually. In many cases the officer owns the house in which he lives, and yet gets, through an agent who signs the voucher, $2,160 per year in addition to his pay, fuel, forage, and other allowances. So also in this city are twenty-nine majors, for each of whose quarters is paid $1,727 annually; and seventeen captains, for each of whose quarters is paid $1,296 annually; and thirty-one lieutenants, for each of whose quarters is paid $864 annually. Why not cut down the appropriation for this purpose and so stop the abuse?

But whether we remedy all these evils in this bill or not, I hope it will pass, and that we shall thus at least begin the good work of retrenchment and reform and so meet the reasonable expectations of the people.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, this debate has taken a very wide range. We have had discussed here the customs laws, the laws affecting internal revenue, banking and currency, legal-tender, and nearly all the general laws to be found upon the statute-book. I propose for a few moments to call the attention of the committee to the Army appropriation bill, and to ask the committee to consider the theory of this and all other appropriation bills. It is not the province of an appropriation bill to change existing laws. The rules of the House forbid that any provision changing existing law should be ingrafted upon an appropriation bill. Yet this debate has been full of admonitions and advice to the Committee on Appropriations which looked to, and could only be effected by, a change of law. We have been told on every hand how we might economize, how we might save public expenditures; but all these admonitions have involved a change of existing statutes; and in nearly all the cases the gentlemen making the suggestions have known this as well as the Committee on Appropriations.

This bill was met here upon its very introduction by an attack from a gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, as "ill-advised" and "ill-considered." The gentleman from Connecticut, like all gentlemen who have addressed the committee, is in favor of economy. All the speeches here have been prefaced by that general declaration, "We are in favor of economy." But the gentleman from Connecticut says that he wants this economy in accordance with some well-considered scheme, and he regards this proposition to reduce the Army as "ill-considered."

Now, Mr. Chairman, the propriety of that mode of characterizing the deliberations of a standing committee of this House is a matter of personal taste and personal habit. Ten gentlemen at least of the Committee on Appropriations are gentlemen of mediocre character and legislative qualifications. I know that one member of that committee has devoted a month of patient, hard labor to the preparation of this bill, studying every item of it more closely than he ever studied any item in his own personal finances; and after the bill was thus prepared it was submitted to the entire committee, and item by item it received the careful consideration, scrutiny, and approval of that committee. Yet after this consideration it comes in here to be characterized by the gentleman from Connecticut as "ill-considered!"

Now, Mr. Chairman, in this matter of economy, I desire that gentlemen shall be consistent. I desire that they shall show their faith by their works. On the 21st of January last the gentleman from Connecticut who assailed this bill as an ill-considered scheme made some remarks upon the centennial bill, in the course of which he used this language:

> I beg you to listen. I ask you to say whether you can expend three or four million dollars anywhere else as well as in this. You are ready to put your forty to sixty millions a year to build up an Army and Navy, to provide the enginery of war for the mangling of our fellow-beings. But remember we are closing the nineteenth century. The time is coming when the millions of the treasure of the people will be thought more valuable for certain purposes of peace, industry, and progress, than for murdering our fellow-men. A new era has come upon the world.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when is that time coming? [Laughter.] When a proposition comes in here from the Committee on Appropriations which would enable Congress to save the three or four million dollars which the gentleman from Connecticut wants for his centennial, (if Congress in its judgment should see fit to make that expenditure,) the bill is scouted by the gentleman as "ill-considered." He not only is not in favor of a reduction of the enlisted force of the Army, but is crying out here for more Army officials, more promotions, and consequently more expense. He comes in here and demands that there shall be an increase of the medical force of the Army. He is not satisfied with a medical department now of two hundred and twenty-two men for an Army of thirty thousand, but brings in the resolutions of certain medical men, indorses them, and demands that there shall be a larger medical force for the Army and promotions in the Medical Corps. Everybody knows that increased rank carries increased compensation. The gentleman will not consent that when at a military post it becomes necessary to employ a physician of the neighborhood for a temporary purpose, the Government shall resort to that mode of employing by contract service. No; there must be a regular medical officer; he must be employed by the year, and he must be promoted so that he can get the highest scale of compensation allowed by the statute.

But the gentleman does not stop here. He is not content with a force of sixty-five paymasters in the Army, with a clerk allowed by law to each; but he clamors for more paymasters.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Does the gentleman say that there are sixty-five paymasters in the Army?

Mr. WHEELER. I refer the gentleman to the last Register of the Army, which gives that as the number.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. There are only forty-four.

Mr. WHEELER. Then your Army Register is wrong. The Army Register shows that there are sixty-five paymasters in the Army; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALBRIGHT] will agree with me that by a statute they are each allowed a clerk.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Of those who appear in the Army Register some have died and some have resigned. The Paymaster-General informs me that the number is forty-four.

Mr. WHEELER. But the gentleman is not satisfied with an increase of officers in the Medical Department of the Army and in the Paymaster's Department; but he comes to the Ordnance Department which furnishes the enginery of war, a Department through which there went in the past fiscal year in one way or another $6,000,000, more than one-fifth of the entire expense of your Army. In this Department which manufactures the enginery of war, of which the gentleman in one voice complains, and which in another he applauds—in this Department he says there should be increased promotion. This is consistent economy. The gentleman is in favor of economy, but is opposed to its enforcement. He is like the men in Maine who are in favor of the Maine law but are opposed to its enforcement.

Now when the gentleman from Connecticut made his suggestion as to the manner in which we might economize, I said to him that he well knew that it was not within the province of the Committee on Appropriations to make the changes suggested by him; and in response he said, "The Committee on Appropriations now begs for mercy." Mr. Chairman, it is a vital matter now with the Committee on Appropriations to ascertain whether we are to receive that mercy from the gentleman, or whether we must forever rest under his martial frown. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, is there no hope for economy? Is there no hope for the country? Is there no balm in this Gilead? Is there no physician here? O, yes; we are not utterly without hope. Here is the remedy prescribed by the gentleman from Connecticut, given in the Fourth of July style, which seems to animate all his efforts since he became connected with the centennial commission. [Laughter.] Here is the panacea. Let us not despair:

I beg you, if you insist upon reduction, to direct your Military Committee to bring in a bill, beginning with the generals of your Army and going down, so that we may have the machine reduced from a cannon down to a pistol; and not take a musket and take out the mainspring, hammer, and ramrod, and then ask us to use it. Let us at least keep it a pistol, so that we can have something to fight with.

Yes, the Committee on Military Affairs, of whom, as Artemus Ward says, the gentleman from Connecticut "is which." [Laughter.] There was a certain character of old who said in the Good Book, "No doubt ye are the people and wisdom shall die with you."

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I will ask liberty of the gentleman to withdraw the suggestion that the bill be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, that it may go to the Committee on Commerce or the Committee on Contingent Expenses, or something of that sort, if that will suit the gentleman any better.

Mr. WHEELER. The gentleman is not begging for mercy, I trust.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. You will have full notice if I do.

Mr. WHEELER. I want to come now for a moment to the merits of the bill. The gentleman from Connecticut suggests here that we should not have the machine reduced from a cannon down to a pistol, and not take a musket and take out the mainspring, hammer, and ramrod, and then be asked to use it.

This bill appropriates money enough, Mr. Chairman, to recruit 5,200 men. The theory of the Committee on Appropriations is that these men shall go to recruit the frontier regiments. If that will not suffice, then I will tell you where there are plenty of missing ramrods. Go, sir, to the houses of prominent officials in Washington, and take out from there the enlisted men of the Army who are serving as private servants. Put the Army uniform on them, and send them to their regiments, where they belong.

A MEMBER. That is what should be done.

Mr. WHEELER. There is where the missing ramrods are; and there are plenty of them about this capital. These 5,200 men, and the men who are employed here as servants in this capital in the houses of your officials and about the Departments, will give us all the men that are needed for any service now demanded of the regular Army.

The gentleman from Connecticut quoted General Sheridan. He said:

General Sheridan further testifies, in regard to the demands made upon him for troops, that since he came here to this city, in obedience to the summons of the Military Committee, he has received a request from the Interior Department to protect a certain location out in that country, but he has not troops with which to do it.

What are the 1,100 men in the State of Nebraska doing to-day? What the 700 in Utah? What the 1,900 in Dakota? What the 3,300 in Washington and Montana?

Why are we asked at every session of Congress, why have we been asked in these very estimates, for the $2,000,000 for barracks and quarters? Keep your Army on the move, and let the men perform the service which they contracted to perform, and you will not have to furnish them with barracks and quarters, and the Department will not have to clamor here for more men to take care of the frontiers. The force at Salt Lake City is entirely useless; there is no call for a solitary soldier in Utah to-day. With the construction of the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific Railroads, everybody knows that the Territory of Utah could be filled with troops at once, if any provocation were given by the Mormons. What are the thousand and more men doing to-day in New York? What are the thousands of men doing upon the sea-board, except idling in the fortifications? Take these men and put them at their legitimate duties. This drawing-room service for officers, and this lounging about in the fortifications of soldiers, demoralizes both.

We have been told frequently in this debate that the General of the Army opposes this reduction. Sir, I am not at all surprised at that declaration. The General of the Army is naturally sensitive in relation to his command and his position, and has a just pride in it. Accustomed to the command of hundreds of thousands of men, an Army of twenty-five thousand men looks to him like a mere handful. Sir, I yield in admiration to no man in this land for the brilliant soldier whose great deeds have made American arms forever illustrious throughout the world. In all matters relating to the management of the Army I would defer my judgment to his, and I would ask Congress to defer their judgment to his; but with the frankness that characterizes that gallant soldier, I say that in matters relating to the situation and requirements of the country the General of the Army is no better qualified to judge than the Congress of the United States. With the Congress of the United States is the responsibility, and the people will not assent that a proposition involving the expenditure of millions of dollars shall be deferred to the judgment of any one man, however exalted his position. I say this, so far as applicable, to every other military official. It is not human nature that they should wish to divest themselves of power and influence. There are plenty of centurions now as of old, who like to say:

For I also am a man set under authority, having under me soldiers, and I say unto one, Go, and he goeth, and to another, Come, and he cometh, and to my servant, Do this, and he doeth it.

I ask the committee to answer me one question. Why do we require a larger standing Army now than in 1865 and 1866, in that troublesome period that followed the close of the war? In July, 1865, we had only fifteen thousand men in the Army. In July, 1866, we had only twenty thousand men. Was not our frontier line as long then as it is now? Is there any emergency pressing on us which calls for more troops than were required in 1865 and 1866?

Mr. WARD, of Illinois. Will the gentleman tell us if he knows how many enlisted men are employed about the houses of officials in Washington, and the names of officials so employing them, and the number employed by each official?

Mr. WHEELER. The sources of information are as open to the gentleman as they are to me or to any other member of the House. My remark was a general one, and I decline to individualize.

I wish again to recall the attention of the committee to the fact to which I alluded in opening this debate, that last year, for the entire summer, fifteen hundred soldiers, accompanied by three hundred civilians, escorted a small surveying party over a portion of the Northern Pacific Railroad, from the Missouri to the Yellowstone River. The Government sent eighteen hundred men as an escort to that small surveying party. They went seven hundred miles beyond any white settlements. What settlement was disturbed in their scheme? We all know that that demand at least will not exist for the coming summer, that that work will not be prosecuted, and it is very doubtful if this Congress would permit such an escort.

We sent off last year five hundred soldiers on different exploring expeditions throughout our Territories. There is now no emergency requiring them, and I repeat now, in closing this general debate, as I said at the outset, that the Committee on Appropriations are satisfied that this scheme of reducing the Army is entirely and safely practicable. It is not summary in its operation; it is not proposed to take 5,000 men out of the Army to-day, but the Army will deplete itself by expiration of service, death, and desertion, to a standard of 25,000 men by the close of the next fiscal year. Where is the hazard in doing it? We shall be here, I fear, until July next, and there will be but four months of the next fiscal year before Congress meets again. War or other serious emergency would convene Congress here in extra session.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] in debate the other day said that this reduction was sure to be followed by a deficiency bill. This cannot be. If you do not enlist men you will not have to pay, transport, subsist, and feed them.

I now ask that the bill be read by paragraphs for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All general debate on this bill has been closed by order of the House. The bill will now be read by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill by paragraphs, and read as follows:

For expenses of recruiting and transportation of recruits, $105,000.

Mr. WHEELER. I wish to say to the committee that the item just read involves the question of a reduction of the Army; whether the number of enlistments shall be limited to 5,200 men or 10,400.

Mr. HANCOCK. I move to amend the paragraph just read by striking out "$105,000" and inserting "$175,000."

This provision involves the very question that has been discussed by a number of the gentlemen who have occupied the attention of the committee, and especially by my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] who has just taken his seat. The amount which I propose to insert in this paragraph is the amount estimated for by the Secretary of War, and which he says is necessary in order to keep the Army up to its present standard. It involves, of course, the question of the propriety of so doing.

In behalf of that propriety we have heard the concurrent testimony of the Secretary of War, of the General, and of the Lieutenant-General of the Army, in opposition to the views of the gentleman from New York who has just taken his seat, and especially with reference to the necessity of this continued increase, so far as the protection of the frontier is to be affected by it. The Secretary of War, who made a tour along the frontier of Texas last summer in company with the Lieutenant-General, informs us that there is not adequate protection afforded there. While the gentleman from New York may feel that probably he could make a fairer distribution of the force now in the Army, we from that portion of the country have not been able to do so.

We must presume that we now have as much force as we are likely to obtain under the disposition of the Army by those who now have control of it. By the testimony of those three distinguished generals who are the highest in rank, and who have the most immediate control of the administration of the Army, we are told that they are not able to keep an adequate force on the Texan frontier. So inadequate is that protection that I do not believe I speak with any exaggeration at all when I assert that a greater amount than $70,000 worth of property has been destroyed within the last six months, if not within less than that time, in the district which I have the honor to represent. It has been destroyed by the incursions of Indians and Mexicans, solely because of the lack of protection afforded by the Government to that people.

This is attested by the reports of all the generals who have been in command of that frontier from 1866 to the present time, that thousands upon thousands of head of stock are driven from there into Mexico, and are driven to the Indian reservations in large numbers and sold to Indian contractors, and one of the sufferers, who interposed to prevent this being done, was subjected to litigation and damages to the amount of $40,000.

For one I cannot regard with favor this line of policy, which seeks retrenchment and economy at the expense of the lives and property of the people. Not only is property stolen there, but women and children are carried off, and men are butchered and left to bleach on the plains of this section of the country, which the gentleman now seeks by his economy to rob of the little protection they have had, instead of giving them the greater amount to which they are certainly entitled.

Sir, I trust that the testimony of the generals who, by their brilliant deeds, have commanded the admiration of all military men in all countries may be deemed to be entitled to at least as much consideration as should be given to the arguments of one who shows himself to be at least a good general over such a measure of finance as will probably tend to bring about a political reaction in the interests of those who are in no way exposed to these dangers.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WHEELER. In reply to my friend from Texas, and my colleague on the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. HANCOCK,] I desire simply to say this, that during the several years of our late "unpleasantness" the State of Texas contrived to furnish several thousand most excellent troops for the confederate army, and at the same time to take care of its own Indians.

Mr. HANCOCK. And Texas will undertake to do it to-day for half the money now expended there, if permitted to do so.

Mr. WHEELER. I am not addressing myself to that point. I say that with four thousand United States troops within her own borders, with one thousand more on her immediate frontiers, with her citizens all at home, and nothing to look after in that direction, Texas ought to be able to get along as well as she did during the war.

Mr. HANCOCK. I move to amend by striking out the last word, in order to show how very unjust the remarks of the gentleman from New York are. I indulged in no such flings as those he has made, and am a little astonished that they should come from that quarter.

Mr. WHEELER. I simply state the fact.

Mr. HANCOCK. We may have had differences about that. I do not know that there is much difference between the gentleman and myself. I have no disposition to bring up any such differences; but I wish to test the justice of his remarks. Texas has twice, during the administration of the government of that State which has just closed, sought to put her own troops in the field for the purpose of protecting her citizens against this wholesale system of robbery and butchery; but the gentleman or his party have absolutely refused to permit that State to arm a single soldier to go upon the frontier and defend our citizens. Is that because there was the "little unpleasantness" which the gentleman is pleased to refer to, and does he and those who associate with him treasure up, on that account, a sort of malice, that is gratified to see women dragged into bondage forty-fold worse than death and men murdered by these savages? If that is the feeling of the gentleman from New York, or any other gentleman here, he is welcome to it.

Mr. WHEELER. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] know of anything that prevents the State of Texas from arming its own militia and protecting its own citizens? Is it not the province of the Government of the United States to elect whether it will take the militia of Texas for its own work or whether it will keep its regular Army there?

Mr. HANCOCK. The troops raised there by the State were ordered to disband by a special Executive order. The gentleman from New York ought to know that fact.

I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. COBURN. I renew the amendment. There are quite a number of posts occupied in the State of Texas; but from the remarks of the gentleman from that State it would seem that there are not troops enough there to take care of the settlers. I do not know whether that gentleman is fully informed as to the facts, but there are at least three posts on the frontier of Texas—Camp Stockton, Fort Davis, and Fort Quitman—that afford no protection whatever to the settlers. Those posts were established under the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo, to keep the Indians of our country from making inroads into Mexico. But we have paid Mexico $10,000,000 and are relieved from the obligations of that treaty. Yet those forts are still kept up, and are occupied by troops. If there is any military necessity for protecting the people of Texas, it would be very easy to withdraw troops for the purpose from those three forts.

Besides that, we have a great number of men in the forts on the Atlantic coast. These are artillerymen; but they are drilled as infantrymen, and can do duty as such. They can be, if necessary, sent to Texas. There is no difficulty in finding plenty of soldiers to meet any emergency that may occur there. The General of the Army can gather up two thousand soldiers in less than two weeks and ship them down to Texas. Hence we need not be alarmed by any war-cry from that State.

Mr. HANCOCK. Why do you not send the troops there?

Mr. COBURN. That is not for us to say; that is not the business of Congress. It is the business of somebody else. It is a matter of military administration. So far as concerns any war in Texas or any danger to the people there, I say it is perfectly practicable for us to diminish the Army and still have force enough to meet any demands in that section.

Occasionally we read a dispatch from that country and from other parts of the Indian country, giving accounts of the perpetration of outrages. Let me say, that this is a first-rate time to get dispatches from the Indian country. I expect that before these appropriation bills get through the House and the Senate we shall have accounts of quite a number of outrages upon the border. There are men who are somewhat interested in having large appropriations, in order that they may get contracts, and it is a good point to have Congress kept upon the alarm about the time that an appropriation bill is being passed.

At the same time I will say that there are outrages upon the frontier which require the constant watching care of our Army; and the Army is, in that way, doing good duty; it ought not to be withdrawn from the frontier. It would be an outrage upon the settlers to do so. But I say that there are scattered through the country soldiers enough to meet all demands of this kind. There are two hundred men now in the harbor of New York, consituting what is called a "permanent party," who, according to the testimony of General McDowell, are the picked men of the recruits. They are at present engaged in no earthly occupation except drill and dress parade; they are on no kind of duty whatever. Thus you can find at one point or another here and there plenty of men to take care of the helpless people on the borders of Texas. A gentleman near me asks how many troops there are in Texas. The report of the Adjutant-General shows, I believe, about five thousand men there.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Thirty-nine hundred.

Mr. NIBLACK. Mr. Chairman, in the debate a few days ago I took occasion to express some incredulity in regard to the sufficiency of the amount which this bill proposes to appropriate for the support of the Army for the ensuing fiscal year. I still adhere to the opinion I then expressed. I certainly have heard nothing since to change my opinion in that respect. The General of the Army tells us that, as the Army is now constituted, it cannot possibly be supported upon less than the amount of the revised estimates, which is something in excess of $32,000,000.

Now I have listened very carefully to what the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] in charge of this bill, has said at the opening and the close of this debate, and I find the only item upon which, as a practical measure, he proposes to save any money at all is in the reduction for recruiting for the next year. Sir, I have failed to learn from him how we can save the amount proposed to be saved, which is about $4,500,000, I believe.

He says that is a matter we can control by appropriation. Then, if I understand the policy of the gentleman from New York, it is clearly to stop recruiting, to diminish the Army as far as private soldiers are concerned, but to leave the Army, as far as officers are concerned, just as it is; or, in other words, it proposes to leave a large army of officers with a very small army of private soldiers. I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, and to this House, whether that is, in any respect, either economy in the public expenditures or any part of good public policy, or, indeed, anything which the country had a right to expect in view of all that has been said by gentlemen in reference to the reduction of the Army.

Mr. WHEELER. My friend is too old a member and too well skilled as a parliamentarian for me to remind him it is not the province of the Committee on Appropriations to interfere with the organization of the Army. I hope the Military Committee will follow up this step taken by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. NIBLACK. I am fully aware of that, and it is one object I had in speaking the other day when I called the attention of the House to the fact that while the Committee on Appropriations was going along endeavoring to show economy in this proposed reduction of the Army, we would find in the end the whole thing would result in saving no money to the Treasury at all. I am on the floor to-day to reiterate that statement, and to call to mind the extraordinary statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] last week, that he only proposed by this reduction to stop recruiting for the next year, but to leave everything else intact—just as it is. Now that is not a reduction of the Army, properly speaking, but leaves the Army in legal contemplation at the figures at which it now stands. It would suspend recruiting only to leave a large corps of officers, really the most expensive portion of the Army, to be provided for by annual appropriations just as now.

Sir, if that is the only thing we can make a reduction upon I insist it is a reduction not worthy of any considerable attention on the part of Congress. It distorts the Army and impairs its efficiency without saving much money. I do not clamor for a reduction of the Army, perhaps, so much as others, because I do not pretend to know, as an expert, whether we can properly reduce the Army or not. I only know the general impression is that we can make such a reduction. I only insist that, if we attempt a reduction, it shall be systematic and thorough. My colleague from Indiana, [Mr. COBURN,] chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, says that it can be reduced. If so, let that committee report back a bill for its reduction. What I protest against is, we proclaim to the world we save $4,500,000 by merely withholding appropriations, when the only practical effect is to stop recruiting for a time and thus reduce the force of private soldiers in the Army, while at the same time it leaves the whole corps of officers to stand precisely as it is. I wish to have it distinctly understood that I am not a party to this pretended and partial reduction willingly, but only coerced into it from a disposition to vote for a small appropriation in preference to a larger one.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. WHEELER. Does my friend call it a trifle to save $4,500,000?

Mr. NIBLACK. O, no; but the gentleman's plan of only suspending recruiting for a time will not save one-quarter of that amount of money. Why shall we pretend that it will?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] by making the appropriation $121,000, and I do so, Mr. Chairman, for the reason that $121,000 was the appropriation made last year for this very purpose. It seems to me we cannot, in the present condition of the country, appropriate a less sum. That will make a difference of $16,000 only.

Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] says there is no necessity for troops along the sea-coast. Let me point him to the fact that there are but very few troops along the coast at this time. Commencing with Maine, there are in that State but 34. There are but 74 in the State of Connecticut, guarding a fort there. There are 119 in the State of Massachusetts; and so along until you come to New York, where you will find 706 soldiers, which number includes 350 of the Engineer Corps. It is believed by the men who have examined this matter that there is no body of men performing any more important service to the country to-day than the Engineer Corps. They are to-day in the State of New York, being instructed in pontooning and experimenting with torpedoes.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. What does the General of the Army say in his testimony about these very engineer troops in the State of New York to which the gentleman refers?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. General Sherman said this: that if there must be a reduction, he thought that was a better place to commence than with the rank and file. He said, if you reduce the Army, commence with me; not at the foot, but at the head. That is what he said. But he said he considered these men were doing a very important service.

There are three companies employed taking care of Willet's Point and being instructed in the matters I have referred to; and there is one company employed at West Point engaged in instructing the students in engineering. Now, of course, in a discussion of this kind remarks must be desultory. But I may state here that when you go down to Texas you find, instead of five or six thousand troops, that there are 3,906.

Mr. COBURN. According to the report of the Adjutant-General the number is 5,109.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I have the figures as I received them from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER.]

Mr. COBURN. The number I have given is that which I find in the report of the Adjutant-General just published.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I suppose a portion of those troops had not joined their commands when the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] got his figures. According to the figures before me there are 1,827 cavalry, 44 artillery, 2,001 infantry; making altogether 3,906 as I said.

Mr. WHEELER. That discrepancy may arise from taking different returns.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. Last Saturday General Sherman was examined before the Military Committee. His testimony on that occasion is not yet printed. In answer to General Young, a member of the committee, he said that the force in Texas was insufficient to give protection to the settlers there and to take care of the frontier.

It must be remembered that we are taking care of a border land in Texas where there are daily incursions from the Mexicans and half-civilized Indians, and who commit depredations on our farming community there. Now by this testimony ought we to be influenced and guided in this matter? If we cannot take the opinion and judgment of men whom we have selected to investigate this subject, whom are we to believe? The General of the Army, the Secretary of War, General Sheridan, and men who are in command of the different departments, all say that it would be unsafe to withdraw troops.

When you come to talk about the troops in the South, it appears that after all there are but very few there. There are 273 in Baltimore in charge of the fort there. There are in South Carolina but 630.

Mr. WILLARD, of Vermont. What are they used for in South Carolina?

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I think they have been used to protect the poor colored men in their rights. Many of the colored people are not educated, and they need the moral influence and support of a military force, though but small. There are four hundred and twenty-four in Georgia. I do not know what the immediate necessity for troops is there now; but General McDowell says their presence is necessary, and that he has reduced the force there as rapidly as he can. General Sheridan and General Sherman say they ought to have the troops that are in the South in the frontier country. General Sheridan says that since he came to Washington to testify before the Military Committee the Interior Department had made an application to him for the protection of certain localities in his command, but that he could not spare troops with which to do it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DUNNELL. I listened, Mr. Chairman, with a great deal of pleasure, to the opening remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] when this Army appropriation bill was first brought before the House. I had never listened with more pleasure to him, or any other speaker, than up to the time when, I think unfortunately for himself, he let fall the remark that those adventurous men of this country out on the frontier ought to be withdrawn and brought inside of the line of what he called civilization. The remark generally was open to the construction that our frontier, on the whole, had received altogether too much attention from the Government; that what we need just now is to let it alone very largely.

I am of the opinion that too frequently in this House, during this session of Congress, disparaging remarks have been made in relation to the frontier, as though it were indeed a costly portion of the country, as though it ought to be well-nigh let alone, as though it were costing us altogether too much to take care of it. Mr. Chairman, I insist that, after all, it is the most fruitful portion of the country. I wish to quote here from the speech that was made by the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] when he advocated the land grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad. The gentleman then spoke as follows, as reported in the Congressional Globe:

> Mr. Speaker, there lie between Lake Superior and Puget Sound and the mouth of the Columbia River half a million square miles of territory, alternating in prairie and pine forests, and teeming with coal, iron, gold, silver, and copper, the sure elements of national wealth, and waiting the countless thousands who are to find homes there and develop every condition of social growth and prosperity. It is now the home of the Indian, the buffalo, the elk, and the antelope; it is now wholly inaccessible, unproductive, and dead property to the United States. To develop it is a work of such magnitude as completely to defy any combination of private capital.

This great country, comprising Dakota, Washington, and Montana Territories, was spoken of by gentlemen the other day. Already from the single Territory of Montana we have received one hundred and fifty millions of gold within the last ten years. It has cost the Government not five millions to take care of that Territory, and yet it has given us $150,000,000 in gold. That is half the whole specie circulation of the country. Then we have in Washington Territory three hundred thousand square miles of coal land. The gentleman from New York, who made the speech from which I have quoted, spoke correctly; but when he tells these adventurous men to come back from the frontier he mistakes the genius of the American citizen. "Westward the course of empire holds its way," and it is too late to say that the adventurous men of the East shall not find their way into the Territories of the country. These surveying parties are the prospectors to find out where lies the wealth of the country, and if it takes one hundred soldiers or five hundred to guard a surveying party, they are doing more service to the country than any other same number of men in the service and are the most productive men in the whole country. Sir, I believe with the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NIBLACK,] that this bill has in it but little of reduction and real economy, if, after all, it only reduces the amount of money that shall be used for the recruiting service.

Mr. ALBRIGHT. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I renew the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I am led to suppose, from the extraordinary thunderbolt that has been launched at me within the last half hour, that I have made a mistake in suggesting that a proposition for systematic reduction of the Army might better be referred with instructions to the Committee on Military Affairs. I suppose I must crave mercy, for it is evident that the Committee on Appropriations considers itself abundantly capable of taking care of any eleven general branches of the public service, one to each member; and, therefore, instead of suggesting that the Committee on Military Affairs might take this question into consideration and consider it systematically and fairly, I should have concluded to leave the whole question of the Army to the fostering care of its beloved friend, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WHEELER,] who thinks he can do it better than can the eleven men who constitute the Committee on Military Affairs. Sir, I made a mistake there. I ought to have admitted that each one of this Committee on Appropriations, who take charge of the Army and of everything else, is better qualified for a given task than the whole of the eleven men selected by the Speaker to look after it.

There are several points which I wish to touch, but I can hardly refer to them in five minutes. While the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] was sneering at the statement that Texas was suffering from Indian outrages, and suggesting that she was able to take a heavy share in the late war and at the same time take care of her own frontier, I was reading here at my desk the sworn testimony of General Sherman, which shows that there is upon the frontier of Texas a district of country two hundred miles long and one hundred miles wide, once inhabited to a very considerable extent, and by a thrifty population, but now almost wholly desolate, and showing in the ashes of dwellings and the ruined fences the evidences of the raids of hostile Indians. This country he and Mr. MOREY rode over within the last three years.

I did venture to think that if anything is to be done in the way of a reduction of the Army the matter should be left to the consideration of the persons selected by the Chair to consider military affairs, and who can do it with presumably a little better knowledge of the subject, and after getting the opinion of leading military men and devoting their entire time to it. For my own part I disdain pretensions to understand the military art and organization, although I studied them for five years; and I suppose we all ought to yield to the gentleman from New York rather than take any advice from such persons as Grant and Sherman and Sheridan, and others of the class whom he described as pleased with their brief authority and loath to decrease it. We had better leave it to the gentleman from New York than to the great soldiers who, having relieved the country from what some consider the burden of their maintenance, nevertheless came forward to save the country in its day of trouble.

It has been charged upon me that I ask for promotion in the Ordnance Corps. I ask for graduated systematic promotion throughout the Army. Well, you have stopped promotion in that corps. If you do not want an Ordnance Corps, I have nothing to say about it. It has charge of $13,000,000 of real estate and buildings, and of $52,000,000 of other property. If you choose to leave that business to be attended to by a blacksmith and a carpenter, or by some one whom the distinguished warrior from New York may select, so be it. I know something about this Ordnance Corps. I have here a list showing what duty each man is discharging for one-half or perhaps one-quarter of what he would get in civil life for performing similar duties.

If you are going to keep up the Army at all, let a man who has served perhaps twenty-five years as a first or second lieutenant, when a vacancy occurs in a first lieutenantcy or a captaincy, be promoted to it, but do not establish a grade which you will not allow to be filled. If you wish but forty-five officers, or even but fifteen, in this corps, for example, and are unwilling that the Chief shall hold the rank of general, let him be a colonel, a lieutenant-colonel, or whatever you choose; but let all below him have the constant hope of increased rank, honor, and pay, as they pass their twenty, thirty, or forty years of faithful service. As it now is in some branches of the service, when an officer vacates his place, whether high or low in rank, you forbid the next below to come a step higher, and thus take away an incentive to honorable ambition.

If you want a small army, make it fifteen thousand or make it ten thousand; but whatever you make it, give it regular gradation and permanency. Give the young man who consecrates himself to his country's service and tries to be a soldier and a gentleman a chance to step up in time and in due order. Let there be gradation and promotion, and compliment, and honor, and certainty of continuance in the service. Establish a policy for times of peace and adhere to it, so that whatever Army you have, large or small, it may possess due proportion and harmony of parts, and honorable ambition fairly rewarded, and command the respect of the people.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HALE, of Maine. It is very evident, Mr. Chairman, that the way of the economizer is hard. I think I can safely and honestly say for the Committee on Appropriations that it has believed that it was at work in the direction that the majority of the House wished it to work—in the direction of saving money, and in the direction of public sentiment. How much encouragement it has received from time to time in different stages of its labor has been shown here.

I do not allude to this by way of finding fault, because it is but natural. I have myself been in the same situation of gentlemen who are upon other committees, jealous of any committee that has supervision of matters appertaining to other and different committees; that is natural. But I call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to this danger, that that feeling may be carried so far as to utterly and entirely cripple the Committee on Appropriations in its honest efforts to cut down expenses.

Now, what is indeed the duty of the Committee on Appropriations? It must look over all the ground; it must ascertain the revenues of the Government; it must ascertain the expenses in each Department. And wherever it finds that $1,000 or $100,000,000 can be saved in any Government Department, it is its duty to so report to the House, and to fight its bill through if it can. And every reduction of that kind must be inside of the letter of the law. So soon as the Committee on Appropriations seeks to change any existing law, it is subject not only to the objections which may be urged by the different Departments, but to points of order which may be made under the rules of the House. It is, therefore, driven to seek what money can be saved within the law.

Does any gentleman find fault with the Committee on Appropriations when, in accordance with that principle, it reports a bill here and argues to the House that money can be saved? Yet fault has been found with this bill under charge of my friend from New York, [Mr. WHEELER;] and the men who have been in the Army, and have Army sympathies, find fault as soon as any. It is said that the Committee on Appropriations has not commenced aright; that the officers ought to be first struck at. And General Sherman's testimony has been quoted. Why, sir, if the Committee on Appropriations had undertaken to change the pay, or rank, or status of a single officer in the Army, from the General-in-Chief down to the second lieutenant, it would have been hurled out of this House in an instant upon a point of order; and I have no doubt the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY] would have been as early to make that point as anybody. We could not move in that direction. We could move, however, in the direction of limiting the number of enlistments for the year to come, and thereby lay the basis, if it were needed, for a reorganization of the Army afterward, which God forbid that the Committee on Appropriations should ever undertake. That belongs to the Committee on Military Affairs.

In answer to the point raised by the gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. HAWLEY,] why the Committee on Appropriations did not wait for the Committee on Military Affairs to report, I will ask him when and where a single appropriation bill would be reported to reduce our expenditures one dollar if the members of the Committee on Appropriations sat in their chairs in their committee-room and waited for the several committees of this House, on Naval Affairs, on Military Affairs, on Indian Affairs, on Public Buildings and Grounds, &c., to recommend a reduction? Sir, this talk of economy and retrenchment would be nothing but the wildest vaporing if the Committee on Appropriations waited for any such thing. Not that I would say that those gentlemen would not some time report some measure that would look to retrenchment. But the session would be gone, the days and nights would speed away, and at last every appropriation bill would be passed making appropriations to the same extent as the year before.

Therefore in this case the Committee on Appropriations has sought to limit its action to the law. It did the same thing in the naval appropriation bill in relation to the Marine Corps. There was not an officer of that corps, from the brigadier-general commanding down to the lieutenant, that we could touch. But we did limit enlistments, cutting off five hundred men. And the House sustained the Committee on Appropriations in that direction. I want gentlemen to feel that the Committee on Appropriations do not seek to antagonize other committees, but is honestly at work in the performance of the duties devolved upon it by the House.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HAWLEY, of Connecticut. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CROUNSE. I renew the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, so far as this bill contemplates a reduction of the Army it will have my opposition. There are considerations of a general nature, perhaps, which might lead us to oppose this bill, lying in the fact that this Government should keep an army sufficient to protect itself and to maintain its dignity.

I wish, however, to speak more particularly from my stand-point. With the present number of the Army I find there are allotted to my State but 1,032 soldiers. That, I know, is wholly inadequate to meet the demands of the citizens of that State. And I might speak in behalf of the Territories beyond the State I represent, which have no vote on this floor.

But I speak understandingly, I speak intelligently I think, when I say that this number is wholly inadequate to the demands of the people of Nebraska. And when I speak for the people of Nebraska I do not speak for that long-haired set of bullies whom some gentlemen may consider as the representatives of the frontiersmen. I speak for a class of men who have been induced to emigrate to that western country in search of free homes, an honest yeomanry, men who called for the construction of the Pacific Railroad, and who are seeking to develop the resources of that far-off country.

Sir, it was an ill-advised remark of the gentleman having charge of this bill when he suggested that necessity might demand that we retract the borders of civilization. Sir, it would be a sad and humiliating confession for this Government to declare its inability to protect any of the citizens within its borders. I demand for the people of my section that protection to which their energy and honesty entitle them. I am not speaking in the interest of contractors. I repudiate the intimation which fell from the lips of some gentleman, that the West is clamorous for the increase of the Army as contributing, perhaps, to the benefit of contractors. I speak not for that class of men. I say that the man who has not read of the troubles existing upon the borders of my own State has given but little attention to the history of this country. I could produce here letters from the governor of my State, received within the last day or two, in which he asks for military protection to the settlers. I might refer to the columns of the daily newspapers, by which it could be shown that almost every morning we are startled with news of raids by the Sioux and other Indians upon the peaceful settlers of that State. Such things retard the settlement, not only of our State, but of the entire West. It is important that the Government should adopt such a policy as shall give to settlers that feeling of security which will encourage emigration.

Mr. SHANKS. I ask the gentleman whether there is any foundation for these rumors of outrages by Indians in Nebraska? If so, where and when?

Mr. CROUNSE. I can give the gentleman the authority of the governor of my State, a gentleman who needs no eulogy at my hands.

Mr. SHANKS. We want facts, not eulogies.

Mr. CROUNSE. What evidence does the gentleman want?

Mr. SHANKS. I want the evidence that somebody has been murdered, that somebody has been hurt, that somebody has been wronged, by an Indian within the State of Nebraska since the last appropriation bill was passed.

Mr. CROUNSE. If the gentleman wants a scalp, I have not provided myself with one to show him. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHANKS. No, sir; the gentleman has no scalp; and he has not seen one within that time.

Mr. CROUNSE. If the gentleman will visit my State, or will visit the frontier, he will find the country almost whitened at different places with the bones of peaceful citizens.

Mr. SHANKS. This general talk amounts to nothing. I want facts.

Mr. CROUNSE. The gentleman would not probably be convinced if an angel from heaven came here to bear testimony. But if the gentleman could put himself in the position of my people, he would occupy a different attitude upon this question.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I say that I must protest against any measure which looks to a reduction of the military force needed for the protection of our frontier.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Chairman, the clause under discussion touches only the question of the appropriation to be made for the enlistment of men for the Army. I am in favor of the smallest appropriation that has been suggested for that purpose. It may be that the reduction of the Army should begin at the other end—with officers and not with privates. It may very well be that we should have some well-considered plan submitted to us for reducing all branches of the Army. But when the question is as to enlisting new men, I think it safe for any gentleman who desires a reduction of the Army to go for the smallest sum proposed for that purpose.

I know that gentlemen on the frontier tell us that there are not now enough troops there for the protection of our citizens in those parts. If they are justified in those assertions, let troops be withdrawn from such points as the gentleman in charge of this bill has indicated—points throughout the country where they are not needed. It has been stated on the floor to-day that there are a thousand troops in the State of New York. Surely they are not needed to preserve order there. Let these troops, then, go to the frontier. We are informed, also, that there are now in this District a large number of troops serving in citizens' dress. I have heard it stated by a distinguished member of the administration party (I am not at liberty to give his name, but if I am in error the gentleman in charge of this bill will be able to correct me) that there are in the city of Washington alone over a thousand enlisted men hanging around passages and stairways and in domestic service. Let those men also be sent to the frontier.

But, Mr. Chairman, however illy distributed the Army may be, there are two controlling facts which lead me to favor its reduction.

One is that during the last year fifteen hundred, or was it two thousand, men were, as my colleague [Mr. WHEELER] has stated, found at liberty to march with a surveying party of the Northern Pacific Railroad, that great scheme whose failure has done more to injure the credit of this country than perhaps almost any other enterprise ever set on foot in these States; a scheme which, exploited as it had been among the religious classes, in its failure dragged down to ruin hundreds of people of slender means throughout the country.

The other great fact controlling my judgment on this subject is that, with the present size of the Army, men were found not only to guard this railroad property, but to enforce the mandates of a judge issuing process upon his own motion, to overawe and drag down the regular government of the State of Louisiana and overthrow the will of its people, which I believe to have been not only the greatest outrage, but the greatest political crime of the time. Let troops be taken away from the South and put upon the border, where they will be useful. But so long as they are liable to be used to dragoon a sovereign State by the fiat of the President and to override the will of its people, I am against any increase of the Army. I would rather see the Army of the United States without an enlisted man than see any one who comes into the President's chair left at liberty to repeat such an outrage as was perpetrated upon that most unfortunate State.

Mr. CROUNSE, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SHANKS. I renew it. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have sat here quietly for a number of days and listened to the debate upon the proposition to keep up the full strength of the Army. The principal reason offered for so doing has been, as I expected, the Indian question. Except in the Sioux country and in Arizona there has been no difficulty with the Indians since the last appropriation bill was passed. I sat quietly because I could afford to sit quietly when I had a cause upon which I could rely. Now we have just heard that the plains of Nebraska are whitened with the bones of something—God only knows what, [laughter;] I do not know, sir, whether the bones of buffalo or what other bones they could have been. That Nebraska has been whitened with the bones of human beings murdered by Indians in the last year I protest is not true. There is no foundation in fact for any such statement. It is not proper to make any such allegation upon this floor; it does not belong to the deliberation of a body like this, legislating for the good of the country, and settling troublesome and vexed questions; it is no portion of the legislation of the country to report any such thing.

Not long ago, Mr. Chairman, there was, to be sure, a controversy between the Sioux Indians and the Pawnees, and whatever part of the country may have been whitened with the bones of the Pawnees I do not know; but that any of the white people of Nebraska were murdered and their bones whiten the plains of that State is not true. It is true from the position of the people of Nebraska and other parts of the western country, in reference to the Indian tribes, that when one Indian tribe sacrifices another Indian tribe it is information which ought to be satisfaction to them, and especially to those who have no respect for any Indian whatever. Now I hope the gentleman from Nebraska will explain these whitened bones upon the plains of Nebraska. Whose whitened bones are they? [Laughter.]

Mr. CROUNSE. Let me ask the gentleman if a conflict between two tribes of Indians results in the death and extinction of one of them, if such occurrence takes place within the limits of a civilized State, whether it is not due to the Government and the people to put a stop to any such conflict, and to give to the settlers that security to which they are entitled? Does he not know that where such raiding is going on between Indian tribes white men cannot live in peace?

Mr. SHANKS. If it is a difficulty between Indians, between one Indian tribe and another Indian tribe, and not between Indians and white people; if the result is to be the wiping out of one Indian tribe by another, it should be stated in that way. But the gentleman speaks of his constituents being murdered; he speaks of statements in newspapers; he speaks of the alarm having been sounded over Nebraska. In answer to the gentleman, I have only this to say: The Government called upon the Sioux Nation very properly and said to them, "You have a treaty made with you by General Sherman"—the same General Sherman so often quoted here to-day—"by which you have the right to ramble all over Western Nebraska, but inasmuch as you violated the provisions of that treaty, by which it was agreed the Sioux should keep peace with all other Indians as well as with the white people, we will curtail your privileges." Accordingly the Government has curtailed them of the privilege of rambling all over that part of Nebraska. The Government did it because they had violated the terms of the treaty between themselves and the United States.

Now, I again ask the gentleman to point out a single instance of where human beings have been murdered; a single instance where any white man or woman's bones have whitened upon the plains of Nebraska since the passage of the last appropriation bill; of a single instance of any Nebraska man or woman who has been killed there by the Sioux or any other Indians. I do not want any newspaper statement. If the gentleman tells me he knows John Smith, or John Jones, or anybody else was murdered by Indians in Nebraska, I will take his statement, but I do not want any vague newspaper rumors.

Mr. CROUNSE. I did not bring any witnesses here, because I did not think it was necessary.

Mr. SHANKS. You have none.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I know this is a military bill, but the relation between the military and civil ought to be peaceable at least. It ought to have the solidity of civil life and the courtesy of military life; I hope we may have them both. We are now arriving at that clause in the bill upon which very much of the proposed reduction of the Army turns. If this item be adopted as reported by the committee, and if an amendment, which will be proposed in a few moments, which simply says no money in this bill shall be used to recruit soldiers for the Army above twenty-five thousand men, shall be made, it closes that chapter against what the gentleman from Indiana fears on the score of a deficiency for the next year, and at least $1,000,000 will turn on the determination of the clause now under consideration.

Mr. NIBLACK. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Indiana will excuse me; I have only a few words to say and will finish immediately.

The whole question, then, comes down plainly to this: Can we, in our present situation, fairly make this reduction of the Army? It has been sufficiently explained why we have not struck at the staff and Army roster of commissioned men, and I am glad to know that the Committee on Military Affairs are working on that problem with the hope that they may bring in a further reduction before the term ends. But can this be done? Can we do the proposed work of reduction now before the House? Let us come to that.

One gentleman says we cannot spare the troops from the frontier. Another gentleman from the Northwest says we cannot spare them there. I will try to tell the gentlemen where I think we can spare the troops. There are two places where they can be spared. At the present moment there are six thousand of our Army posted east of the Mississippi River. I think that almost the whole of that number can be spared and sent to the frontier. And if we will give you five thousand out of our Army now east of the Mississippi River, and put them on the frontier, I ask will that answer my friend from Texas? Will that answer my friend from Nebraska? I think it ought.

Now, will anybody tell me why there should be, as there are this day, 1,224 troops of the United States, enlisted men, in the harbor of New York and the forts around it? Can anybody tell me why fifteen companies of our Army are in and about New York City and its environs? Can anybody tell me why there are needed four companies in Fort Adams, Rhode Island? Yet they are posted there to-day. Can anybody tell me why two companies are needed in a fort in your own district, Mr. Chairman, or at least in your own State? I cannot tell the reason why. Take then, I say, that 1,500 or 2,000 men out of New England and New York—even admitting that the South wants all that are there now—take that number and put them on the frontier.

Now I call attention to another matter in connection with the stationing of the Army. There are this day 1,000 men to guard the Canada line—twelve companies to guard the Canada line. On whose side? On ours. And there is not a red-coated soldier from the mouth of the Saint Lawrence to Pembina anywhere guarding the British subjects against us on our frontier and theirs. Do you know any reason why we want an army to meet our British friends and guard our frontier against them? If they do not need it against us why do we need it against them? I think perhaps we ought to have one company at the Sault to take care of the Indian traders, and the class of people that come there, so as to keep the peace. But I know of no reason for a single soldier anywhere on the line between here and the Dominion of Canada except at that single point.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Just one word more. I think this can be done without crippling the Army one iota; and I hope the House will enable us to put on this restriction, that the number shall not go above 25,000.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. WHEELER. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will allow a vote on the pending amendment; and after this paragraph is disposed of I will then move myself that the committee rise.

Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts. I withdraw my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. HANCOCK,] which the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "five" in the tenth line, and insert the words "seventy-five," so that it will read:

For expenses of recruiting and transportation of recruits, $175,000.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 11, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WHEELER. I offer the following amendment:

Add to line 10 these words:

And no money appropriated by this act shall be paid for recruiting the Army beyond the number of twenty-five thousand enlisted men.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For contingent expenses of the Adjutant-General's Department at the headquarters of military divisions and departments, $3,000.

Mr. WHEELER. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KELLOGG reported that the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 1009) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

HENRY S. WELLES.

Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1759) for the relief of Henry S. Welles; which was read a first and second time, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

ARKANSAS CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. THOMAS. I rise to a privileged question. I am instructed by the Committee on Elections to report the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Asa Hodges is entitled prima facie to a seat in the Forty-third Congress as a Representative from the first congressional district of the State of Arkansas, without prejudice to the right of L. C. Ganse, claiming to have been elected thereto, to contest his right to the same upon the merits.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to say a few words in presenting this resolution. I was instructed by the committee, unanimously, to report the resolution, or perhaps I should rather say that no member of the committee dissented to the resolution. Certain credentials were referred to us, and the committee were of the opinion that those credentials emanated from the proper authority in the State of Arkansas, and disclosed the fact that Mr. Hodges is prima facie entitled to his seat in this House. With this statement I ask the previous question upon the resolution.

Mr. COX. I understand that the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] who is a member of the Committee on Elections, desires to be heard upon this question, and I hope the resolution will not be urged at this late hour.

Mr. HAZELTON, of Wisconsin. I would inquire if the gentleman from Mississippi has expressed a desire to be heard on this question?

Mr. THOMAS. I understood that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] did not dissent from the resolution. He was present in the committee when it was adopted.

Mr. COX. I think it ought not to be pressed to-night, and I will move to adjourn.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 223) changing the times for holding certain district courts of the United for the State of Iowa.

LIFE-SAVING STATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the act of March 3, 1873, to provide for the establishment of life-saving stations on the coast of Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Virginia, and North Carolina; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COX. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put; and on a division there were—ayes 64, noes 58.

So the motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as follows:

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FENTON presented the memorial of hat manufacturers and dealers of the city of Rochester, New York, remonstrating against the extension of the Wells patent for forming hat-bodies; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. FENTON. I also present the petitions of a large number of prominent citizens of the city of New York, including bankers and merchants in the shipping and produce and other branches of trade, in regard to the currency question. It will be remembered, Mr. President, that I called the attention of the Senate a few days ago to the memorial of several hundred of the leading bankers and merchants of New York in relation to the financial condition of the country, and especially in regard to the disordered condition of our currency. The petitions which I now present, signed by equally well-known citizens, are to the same end, and they conclude with a prayer, in which they "beg leave to represent most earnestly that a resumption of specie payments at the earliest practicable time is imperatively required by the true interests of the nation, and they most respectfully deprecate the issue of any more currency, as such proceeding would postpone indefinitely a return to a sound financial condition."

I move that these several petitions be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER presented the petition of the Syracuse Temperance Union, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, its relations to pauperism, crime, the public health, and general welfare; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of George W. Lake, a citizen of the United States, and a resident of Massachusetts, praying damages in the sum of $35,000 for certain wrongs inflicted upon him while in Japan, through Willie P. Mangum, United States consul, and Charles E. DeLong, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the memorial of a large number of citizens of Massachusetts, protesting against any extension of the patents on sewing-machines, especially that known as the Wilson patent, or any other patents, the extension of which has been asked for or may be asked for; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

He also presented four several petitions from the heirs and representatives of persons, praying indemnification for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I present the memorial of 2,000 persons residing in Essex County, New Jersey, remonstrating against the further extension of the Wells patent for forming hat-bodies, and a like memorial from 70 persons residing in Plainfield, New Jersey. These memorialists set forth that they remonstrate against this extension because they cannot earn equal wages with the hat-bodies prepared by the machines under that patent that they can when prepared by other machines; that they are dependent on their daily toil for the support of their families, and do not feel bound to contribute to this patentee; that the hat business in the country gives them employment but eight months in the year, and if this patent is not further extended the price of hats will be so reduced that there will be a large export trade which will give them employment through the whole year. These 2,000 persons are practical hatters in and around the city in which I have the honor to reside. I move the reference of the memorials to the Committee on Patents.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FENTON presented the petition of Mary B. Hook, widow of the late Colonel James H. Hook, United States Army, praying to be allowed a pension for services rendered by him to the Government; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WRIGHT presented two memorials of manufacturers, wholesale dealers, and retailers of hats, of Iowa, remonstrating against the extension of the Wells patent for forming hat-bodies; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. THURMAN presented five memorials from citizens of Columbus, Dayton, Mansfield, Steubenville, and Toledo, Ohio, remonstrating against the extension of the Wells patent for improvements in machinery for making hat-bodies; which were referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. JOHNSTON presented the petition of J. B. Craghill and others, praying indemnification for spoliations committed by the French prior to the year 1801; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of numerous citizens of Oregon, praying an appropriation of $50,000 for the improvement of the military wagon-road from Scottsburgh to Camp Stewart, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL. I also present a petition, signed by General Jeff. C. Davis, United States Army, and other persons residing in Oregon, the prayer of which is as follows:

> Your petitioners would respectfully represent that they are acquainted with George Resinger, who has served the Government for twenty-six years as a soldier with a good record; he has resided in Oregon since September, 1860; and though he has no family, nor wife, nor kindred to bring him under the general laws of Congress entitling him to a pension, and as he desires to spend the remainder of his life in the State of his adoption, where he has many warm friends, and where kind hands have already assisted him in his need, and preferring a small pension to the privilege of the Soldiers' Home, to which he is entitled, he asks your honorable body to pass an act granting him the relief in form of a pension that he would be entitled to receive under the general act if he had a family.

I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying that prepayment of postage be required on all mail matter, and for the better regulation of the salaries of postmasters; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BOREMAN presented a memorial of citizens of Wheeling, West Virginia, remonstrating against the extension of the Wells patent for forming hat-bodies; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. MERRIMON presented the petition and papers of Lieutenant John Shelton, North Carolina Volunteers, praying to be allowed the full pay and allowance of a first lieutenant of infantry for a certain term of service; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I am requested to ask the Senate that the papers in certain cases, on the list which I send to the desk, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims. They are the cases of citizens of this District which were not acted upon by the committee at the last session of Congress. They are claims growing out of the erection of Fort Stevens, in the vicinity of the farms of these persons.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has there been an adverse report?

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. I am advised that there has not been.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That the papers in relation to the following claims on the files of the Senate be referred to the Committee on Claims:

William B. Beal, Sarah Matthews, James Pilling, R. McChesney, B. D. Carpenter, J. H. McChesney, James Selden, Samuel Anderson, A. C. P. Shoemaker, Henrietta Norton, Thomas Talbott, D. N. Colclazer, Jacob Pass, Charles J. Stuart, Enos Ray, Oliver Dufour, Abram Hyman, Henry Batton, Thomas Fitnam, James Mulloy, Jacob Colclazer, Sarah A. Graves, F. G. Rohr, D. L. Howe.

Mr. DAVIS. I suggest, in connection with that order, that if there has been an adverse report in any of these cases, copies of the papers be retained.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order has already been entered generally for the session. The Chair understands that in these cases there has been no adverse report.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Maryland. So I am advised.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be entered.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, it was Ordered, That the claimants in the case of losses sustained by citizens of Wrightsville, Pennsylvania, by the burning of the Columbia bridge, have leave to withdraw their papers from the files.

AMOS FARLING.

Mr. PRATT. Last evening I entered a motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 1754) to amend the act entitled "An act granting a pension to Amos Farling," approved February 5, 1873, on the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont. I have examined the bill since, and find that it simply corrects an act passed on the 5th of February, 1873, granting a pension to Amos Farling. The act of that date gave a pension to "Amos Farling, late a private in Company H, Twenty-seventh Regiment United States Infantry." The present act amends that, or rather corrects the name of the company; and that is the only change that is made in the act. It changes the name of the company from "Company H" to "Company C." I therefore withdraw the motion which I entered last evening.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to withdraw the motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill referred to by him. The Chair hears no objection.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MERRIMON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Susan A. Shelby, praying compensation for cotton seized at Port Gibson, Mississippi, in 1864, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 433) for the relief of Mrs. Susan A. Shelby.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph R. Curtis, praying compensation for extra work in the erection of the branch mint at San Francisco, submitted an adverse report, which was agreed to and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John P. Thomas, administrator of the estate of Robert S. Thomas, deceased, of Kansas City, Missouri, praying compensation for property destroyed by United States soldiers while rented and occupied by the United States military forces in 1863, submitted an adverse report, which was agreed to and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 176) to encourage the establishment of public marine schools, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. STOCKTON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of William Kilburn, praying for the passage of a law authorizing his restoration to the Navy as an ensign, at the foot of that class of which he was a member at the time of his resignation, reported a bill (S. No. 437) to restore William Kilburn, of San Francisco, California, to the Navy of the United States, as an ensign; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. FENTON. I am requested by a highly respectable citizen of my State to ask leave to introduce a bill.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 434) referring to the Court of Claims for adjudication and determination the claim of the parties therein named for the past and future use of Norton's postmarking and post-canceling hand-stamp, and of Robertson's improved hand-stamp; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 435) to amend an act to restore a part of the Round Valley Indian reservation, in California, to the public lands, and for other purposes, passed March 3, 1873; which was read twice by its title, referred, with accompanying papers, to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRIMON, (by request,) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 436) for the relief of Lieutenant John Shelton; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

GAS INVESTIGATION.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, in making the inquiry ordered by the Senate on the 29th of January, shall have power to send for persons and papers; and the expenses attending such investigation shall be paid out of the "miscellaneous" item of the contingent fund of the Senate.

All I have to say is, that I do not anticipate that there will be any expense about this save the cost of a reporter for three or four days.

Mr. MORTON. What is the investigation?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. An investigation in regard to the gas company in this city.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PAY OF LOUISIANA CLAIMANTS.

Mr. WEST submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to John Ray and William L. McMillen, each, full compensation as Senators for the unexpired term for which they were elected, as shown by their respective credentials, until the 4th of March, 1873.

WILLIAM H. VESEY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, the Calendar will be taken up. The Secretary will report the first bill on the Calendar.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first bill on the Calendar is the bill (H. R. No. 1400) for the relief of William H. Vesey.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, before the vote is taken I desire to reply very briefly to one or two points of objection which were made by the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] and by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] yesterday. The question was asked what evidence there was that this money had been paid by Mr. Vesey into the Treasury of the United States. The answer to that will be found in the report which was submitted by the committee. In the report it is said:

The Secretary of the Treasury makes no recommendation, but admits that Mr. Vesey has paid the amount of the loss into the Treasury.

That is a fact found by the committee upon correspondence with the Treasury Department, that the amount of money stated in the report was paid by Mr. Vesey from his own funds into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HOWE. What Secretary admits that?

Mr. PRATT. There was a correspondence with the Treasury Department at the time this claim was before the Committee on Claims—that is my recollection—and the Secretary of the Treasury admitted the payment of this sum. I find that fact explicitly stated in the report, and I have a general recollection on the subject that this claim was referred to the Secretary of the Treasury and that he made that response.

The next point that was made by way of objection was what evidence the committee had as to the amount of loss; or, in other words, that Mr. Vesey had received a dividend of only 10 per cent. upon the amount deposited with this house. That fact was ascertained by the affidavit of Thomas Taylor, who swears upon the 23d of March, 1859, as follows:

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Paris, March 23, 1859.

I, Thomas Taylor, of Havre, in the empire of France, do hereby solemnly declare and make oath that I have been many years employed as cashier and principal clerk in the American consulate at that port; that to my positive knowledge Mr. W. H. Vesey, United States consul at Havre aforesaid, was in the habit of depositing in the hands of Messrs. Greene & Co., respectable American bankers at Paris, for safe-keeping, fees received at that office on account of the United States; that on or about the 27th day of March, 1857, Messrs. Greene & Co. suspended their payments, and the amount in their hands so paid to them, belonging to the United States, amounted on this day to, say, 7,628.20 francs, agreeably to the above declaration, which amount Mr. Vesey paid to the United States from out of his private funds; that since the date of such payment to the United States by Mr. Vesey he has received a dividend from Greene & Co. of 10 per cent. thereon; and that for the balance of, say, 6,865.40 francs, equal to, say, $1,318.15, Mr. Vesey has no security whatever, or for any part thereof.

THOMAS TAYLOR.

I believe that replies to all the points that were made.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, if this was the money of the United States, and kept there, and lost because it was kept there, I think the United States ought to pay; but I think the Senator from Indiana is mistaken in supposing that it was the money of the United States. This was a salaried office, but it had fees; and the law of 1856 made this provision about the fees:

That all fees collected at any of the legations, or by the consuls-general, consuls, and commercial agents mentioned in schedules B and C—and by vice consuls and vice commercial agents, appointed to perform their duties, or by any other person in their behalf, shall be accounted for to the Treasury.

And this consulate at Havre was one of those—

Now, I understand from that language that the consuls put the fees collected into their own pockets, or did what they pleased with them; but they returned an account to the Treasury of all the fees collected; and if they collected more than the amount of their salary they paid over that balance to the Treasury. That is what I understand from that language. The consul at Havre was then allowed a salary of $6,000 a year. I have just sent for the report of the Fifth Auditor, in the hope that I may ascertain from that whether he collected more or less than $6,000. That report has not come in. I think the Senator from Indiana had better let this bill lie over and look at that point himself. He certainly does not want this money paid unless it is due, and I want it paid if it is due. We can make the matter certain by taking the proper time.

Mr. PRATT. I have no desire to press this bill to a vote now if the Senator from Wisconsin wishes to obtain further information; and if it is his desire I will consent that the bill shall go over this morning.

Mr. HOWE. I supposed the Senator himself would be as anxious for the information as I am.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over.

Mr. PRATT. I wish to say, however, that I am satisfied myself that this was money of the United States belonging to the Treasury Department. The report of the committee ascertains that fact distinctly. The language I have already quoted, and I will read it again:

The Secretary of the Treasury makes no recommendation, but admits that Mr. Vesey has paid the amount of the loss into the Treasury.

Nothing could be more explicit than that; and certainly this would never have found its way into the report unless the committee had found this fact to be true.

Mr. SUMNER. Two different committees have found that.

Mr. PRATT. Certainly; this has been twice reported from the Committee on Claims, and once from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOWE. But the Senator has heard the language of the law. Now, does he understand that differently from what I do?

Mr. PRATT. I was not paying attention to the quotations from the law.

Mr. HOWE. The law required him to keep an account and to return that account, to account to the Treasury for all the fees he collected, but not to pay them over to the Treasury; and, as I said, my understanding of that language is that it required him simply to pay over to the Treasury whatever he collected above his salary. That interpretation may be right or it may be wrong; but we can make it absolutely certain by taking the proper time.

Mr. PRATT. With the understanding that this case will not lose its place on the Calendar, I consent to the postponement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie over.

NATIONAL-BANK CIRCULATION.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to a bill reported yesterday from the Committee on Finance, to which I believe there will be no objection, and which, for manifest reasons appearing on the face of the bill, ought to pass now. I therefore move to take it up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 432) to amend the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," approved July 12, 1870.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first section repeals so much of the act entitled "An act to provide for the redemption of the 3 per cent. temporary-loan certificates, and for an increase of national-bank notes," as provides that no circulation shall be withdrawn, under the provisions of section 6 of that act, until after the fifty-four millions granted in section 1 of that act shall have been taken up; and makes it the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to proceed forthwith to carry into execution the provisions of section 6 of that act; and to enable him to do so, he is required, from time to time, as needed for the execution of that section, to make requisitions upon each of the national banks described in the section, organized in States having an excess of circulation, to withdraw and return so much of their circulation as by that act may be apportioned to be withdrawn from them, or, in lieu thereof, to deposit in the Treasury of the United States lawful money sufficient to redeem such circulation; and, upon the return of the circulation required, or the deposit of lawful money, as therein provided, a proportionate amount of the bonds held to secure the circulation of such association as shall make such return or deposit is to be surrendered to it.

The second section of the bill provides that upon the failure of the national banks upon which requisition for circulation shall be made, or of any of them, to return the amount required, or to deposit in the Treasury lawful money to redeem the circulation required, within thirty days, the Comptroller of the Currency shall at once sell, as provided in section 49 of the national-currency act, approved June 3, 1864, bonds held to secure the redemption of the circulation of the association or associations which shall so fail to an amount sufficient to redeem the circulation required of such association or associations, and with the proceeds, which shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, so much of the circulation of such association or associations shall be redeemed as will equal the amount required and not returned; and if there be any excess of proceeds over the amount required for such redemption, it shall be returned to the association or associations whose bonds shall have been sold. And it shall be the duty of the Treasurer, assistant treasurers, designated depositaries, and national-bank depositories of the United States, who shall be kept informed by the Comptroller of the Currency of such associations as shall fail to return circulation or to deposit lawful money as required, to assort and return to the Treasury for redemption the notes of such associations as they shall come into their hands until the amount required shall be redeemed.

The third section hereafter makes it lawful for the Comptroller of the Currency to issue circulating notes in the manner and proportion now provided by law, to associations organized or to be organized in those States and Territories having less than their proportion of circulation, under an apportionment made on the basis of population and of wealth, as shown by the returns of the census of 1870; but the whole amount of circulation issued to such banking associations, and withdrawn and redeemed from banking associations under the provisions of the present act is not to exceed $25,000,000, and such circulation is from time to time to be withdrawn and redeemed only as it shall be necessary to supply banks in those States having less than their apportionment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will make a brief statement in regard to this bill, and then, if there is really any objection to it in the Senate, I would rather it should go over, because I wish the Senate to understand it thoroughly.

The sixth section of the act of July 12, 1870, provides for the transfer of banking circulation to the amount of $25,000,000 from certain States that have an excess, to the West and South, where certain States have not their proportion. The Comptroller of the Currency in his annual report has set out certain objections to the practical execution of that section, which disable him, as he thinks, from carrying it into execution. He was therefore called upon by the Committee on Finance to write out precisely what conditions would enable him to carry into execution that provision of the act of July, 1870. The bill which is now before the Senate has received his sanction and the sanction of the Secretary of the Treasury. It makes no new provision of law; it does not change in any way the mode of distribution, but removes some practical impediments in the way of the execution of the law.

The first section of the bill repeals certain clauses of section 6 of the act of 1870, which gave rise to the difficulty. The whole bill has been very carefully drawn, with a view to enable the Comptroller of the Currency at once to organize banks and banking associations in States that have less than their proportion, and pari passu, by requisitions and by installments, to withdraw from certain States circulation in excess of their proportion. The States that will be affected are named on the ninth page of the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, and the banks that will be affected are described in section 6 of the act of 1870. All of them are banks having a circulation of over $300,000, and most of them having a circulation of over $1,000,000. The purpose of this bill is not to change the existing law in any respect, but merely to carry into execution that law, leaving the question of the amount of currency undisturbed in the slightest degree.

Senators must be aware that the unequal distribution of banking circulation has been the constant theme of complaint, and that complaint is a well-grounded one. I do not wish now to repeat it, but it ought to be met and it ought to be removed. It stands in the way of almost every measure on this subject that has been proposed; and I desire to say that this bill receives the hearty assent, so far as I know, of all the Representatives of the States that are affected by it. It affects chiefly the State of Massachusetts; it affects some four banks in the city of New York, thirty-seven in the city of Boston, twenty-one in the State of Massachusetts, seventeen in the city of Providence, and fifteen in the State of Connecticut. I can say that it has the approval of the former Secretary of the Treasury, of the present Secretary of the Treasury, and of the Representatives of these States, so far as I have had an opportunity to consult them; and I think it is just and fair and right, and ought to be passed promptly.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator be kind enough to state the difficulty in carrying out the present law?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. There is a proviso at the end of section 6, which creates the chief trouble:

Provided, That no circulation shall be withdrawn under the provisions of this section until after the $54,000,000 granted in the first section shall have been taken up.

Under that proviso the Comptroller holds that he has no power to commence the removal of this $25,000,000 from the East to the West until the $54,000,000 is taken up. In one sense it has been taken, engaged by certain banks, but they have not yet been able to receive their circulation; some of them have not been able to file bonds, and consequently it may be years before all the $54,000,000 is taken up in a literal sense; and according to his construction he holds that he has no power to call for the $25,000,000 from eastern banks and organize banks in the West until the $54,000,000 of circulation is issued. That probably never will be the case. The full amount is hardly ever reached. That is the great difficulty.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire of the Senator, does the Comptroller hold that where a bank has made application for circulation, and has not filed its bonds to entitle itself to it, that circulation, so to speak, is embargoed, so that it cannot be distributed to others?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator does not understand me. When a bank has been organized, but has not yet filed its bonds and has not actually received its circulation, until all the $54,000,000 provided for by the act is issued the Comptroller holds that he has no power to call in this amount.

Mr. CONKLING. Suppose a bank continues for a year or two years—organizes, but does not file its bonds; during all that time does the amount of circulation that would go to it remain embargoed or stopped, so that it cannot be given to any other bank?

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly, that is clearly the law; and he holds further, that while this embargo—to use the word of my friend from New York—as to a single bank organized under the section continues, he cannot take any step whatever towards executing section 6, which provides for the transfer of $25,000,000 in addition. My friend now understands it.

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. The first section therefore repeals that proviso. That proviso was put on, I believe, in the House of Representatives, probably without much reflection as to its meaning; but it has been a great impediment to the execution of the law. The Comptroller devotes some pages to this subject in his annual report, as Senators will see if they read it, and he points out other difficulties in the way, and those difficulties are met by the provisions of this bill. When this bill is passed, the Comptroller of the Currency will have it in his power, immediately on the passage of the bill, to authorize banks to organize in the Western and Southern States according to the apportionment made under the previous law. That apportionment has already been made, and is set out in the report of the Comptroller. Then he is required to make requisition from time to time, as may be necessary, upon the banks in the Eastern States where the excess exists, and issue that circulation, or rather an equal amount of circulation, to these new banks in the Western States. To avoid all trouble in the practical working of this matter we have adopted his words, so that there can be no question as to the practicability of carrying this plan into execution. This does not in any way affect the question whether we shall have more currency or less currency, or as to any further changes in the banking law; but it is to meet an immediate and imperative demand.

Mr. HOWE. I am not going to offer any objection to the passage of this bill; but as I have been one of those who have complained on this floor as often as, or oftener than, anybody else of the unequal distribution of bank circulation made under existing laws, I want to say one or two things in my own exculpation.

In the first place, I never did complain because Rhode Island had a large banking circulation, or because Massachusetts had a large banking circulation, and I never have seen the day yet when I was anxious to clutch from Rhode Island or Massachusetts any privilege which either of those States now enjoys. I have never comprehended any practical difficulty in the way of making a law so that Wisconsin and Georgia could have as large a banking circulation as capital was willing to afford. I have always thought God's universe was big enough for Rhode Island and Massachusetts and Georgia and Wisconsin all to live in. My friend from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] doubts that. You understand he is constitutionally a little skeptical; but because he doubts, that does not remove from under my feet my own faith. I shall still stand on that.

Mr. President, I have thought it was a burning disgrace to our legislation when year after year capital has come to your Treasury Department and asked for the privilege of establishing a bank in this town, in that town, or the other, and to have a circulation furnished, and been told from time to time that the circulation is not to be had; it is limited, and the limit is reached. And the answer has also been made that if we add to the circulation we inflate the currency. I myself believe that is a good answer, but that is not necessary. A short time since I was permitted by the Senate to lay on your table a bill which authorized the creation of new banks, authorized allowing them a circulation, not by snatching away from any existing banks any portion of their circulation, but just by retiring an amount of greenbacks equal to the amount of new bank circulation issued by the Treasury. That preserves the volume of the circulation just as it is; that takes from no existing bank any privilege it now enjoys; that does not arbitrarily snatch capital from one quarter of the country and send it to another. The only practical effects that that proposition would have, that I can see, would be these two: first, it would stop the clamor from those portions of the country which say they have not such facilities as they ought to enjoy under the law; and, second, it would reduce gradually the redeeming medium, those legal-tender notes which are now the medium for redeeming all bank circulation, so that perhaps banking privileges would be less valuable in proportion as this medium was reduced. I am inclined to think existing banks come to that conclusion, and are of the opinion, on the whole, that they had rather give up the privilege of circulating notes than to give up any part of the obligation of the Government to redeem the notes that they put into circulation.

The Senator from Ohio says that the States from which this circulation is to be withdrawn are perfectly content with this bill, and the banks which are to be affected by it are perfectly content. My conclusion is, therefore, that, whether they have a large circulation or a small one, they are comparatively indifferent about it. But upon one thing they are resolved, and that is, that whatever they circulate the Government shall redeem.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, whether, if an act should be passed authorizing free banking, as is contemplated, this bill would be of any value?

Mr. SHERMAN. If any such act should be passed in the future, as a matter of course it would supersede the operation of this bill. But the Senator will see that we are now endeavoring to carry into execution an existing law, and as a matter of course any future law that may be passed on the subject would repeal or modify this to the extent that they were in conflict.

Mr. BUCKINGHAM. I think there is a reasonable probability of passing an act which will give free banking with certain proper restrictions; and, if so, I see no particular necessity for the passage of this bill for a redistribution of the banking capital. I have no faith, and never have had, that this body or any other body of men could adopt a sound basis for the distribution of bank capital. I do not believe it can be done by legislation; but I believe under a system of free banking bank capital would be distributed and located wherever it could be made profitable, wherever it would be for the advantage both of the capitalist and of those who wanted to employ the capital. That is the course which I should like to see pursued.

Mr. MORTON. I have no objection to the passage of this bill itself; but this bill is in the nature of a mere tub thrown to the whale. If it is intended to answer the demand which has been made from the West and South for an equalization of the national-bank circulation, if that is the purpose of it, I for one am not satisfied with it. It is in itself a delusion. Under the provisions of this bill these $25,000,000 cannot be distributed under two or three years, certainly not under two years, as I think can be very easily shown.

In 1870, when the act was passed providing for taking $25,000,000 from States in excess and giving it to States in deficiency, the amount then was inadequate to supply that deficiency. I remember undertaking to show myself on this floor that it was inadequate. The report of the Comptroller of the Currency shows that when the whole fifty-four millions of increase provided for by the act of 1870 were distributed, it would, according to the elements provided by the census of 1870, still take forty millions to make the equalization. Now the condition of things has greatly changed in four years. If it would take forty millions in 1870 to make the equalization, it will take something more than that to do it now. Twenty-five millions provided for at that time did not meet the want. It would come short of meeting it now, of course.

I agree with my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE.] I have never complained for one moment, and do not now, of what Rhode Island got or Massachusetts got; but what I have complained of, in representing the wishes of the people of my State, as I understand, is that while they do not begrudge to those States what they got, they simply ask that justice should be done to the States in deficiency. Those States have been growing rapidly in four years, and if it required forty millions to make the equalization in 1870, it would require between fifty and sixty millions of dollars, or perhaps even more than that, to make it now. But if this bill should pass, and it should then be held to supply the demand and to make the equalization required, it would not be satisfactory. It is in this point of view that I wish the Senate to consider it.

I could show from the terms of the bill further to the Senator himself that it would take two or three years for this circulation to be distributed, for this reason: It requires that the bills of these identical banks shall first be called into the Treasury and be canceled before a like amount can be issued to the new banks.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a mistake. The Comptroller of the Currency tells me, and it is a matter of public notoriety, that in all human probability it would take three or four years to execute the law as it is, because it has taken three or four years for the banks to be organized under the law. There was no considerable demand from new banks; $5,000,000 would cover every application now pending; but these banks will be organized immediately, and the requisition follows immediately afterwards. In the third section the Senator will find—

> That from and after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for the Comptroller of the Currency to issue circulating notes in the manner and proportion now provided by law, to associations organized or to be organized in those States and Territories having less than their proportion of circulation, under an apportionment made on the basis of population and of wealth, as shown by the returns of the census of 1870.

Then the first section provides for the mode and manner in which, as needed from time to time, requisitions shall be made on banks in the States that have an excess.

Mr. MORTON. I think I am not mistaken. The act of 1870 expressly provides—and that provision is not repealed—that the notes shall not be issued to the new banks in the West and South until a corresponding amount of notes is called in, and the Comptroller says in his report that that cannot be done for a long time.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator has not read the bill.

Mr. MORTON. The Comptroller of the Currency, in his last annual report, says:

> The notes of these banks are so scattered through the whole country that it will be impracticable for them to return their circulation without an expense not contemplated by the act; and it will therefore be for the interest of the banks to provide the Comptroller of the Currency with the requisite amount of legal-tender notes with which to redeem their circulation as it comes into the Treasury. To this extent the act may be executed; but the notes to be redeemed will not come to the Treasury for redemption to any considerable amount, and therefore but a small proportion of the twenty-five millions will be placed at the disposal of the Comptroller for redistribution to the banks of the South and West.

I observe a very peculiar provision in the second section of this new bill:

> And it shall be the duty of the Treasurer, assistant treasurers, designated depositaries, and national-bank depositories of the United States, who shall be kept informed by the Comptroller of the Currency of such associations as shall fail to return circulation or to deposit lawful money as required, to assort and return to the Treasury for redemption the notes of such associations.

In what case are they to assort and return? Only where the bank fails herself to take up her notes or to pay into the Treasury a corresponding amount of greenbacks. The Treasurer is compelled to convert the bonds of the bank into money and redeem the notes there as provided for in another section, and then there is another provision for the assortment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Senate resumes the consideration of House bill No. 792, on the subject of bankruptcy.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senate will pardon me a moment on this banking bill. The Senator from Indiana——

Mr. EDMUNDS. We cannot go on with this financial discussion.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me have one or two minutes to correct a misapprehension.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator from Indiana is willing, as he was cut off, I shall not object.

Mr. MORTON. I have no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, here is a bill that has been carefully prepared at the Department to carry into execution a law in pursuance of the very recommendation made by the Comptroller of the Currency.

The Senator, who had not read the bill, because I handed it to him about fifteen minutes ago——

Mr. MORTON. I read it this morning in the papers very carefully.

Mr. SHERMAN. He asked me for it. He comes here and criticises it; and he says this bill itself provides that these new banks cannot be organized until the circulation is withdrawn from the old banks. I read to him the language of the third section of the bill, which is mandatory, and which is the last order of Congress, declaring that from and after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for the Comptroller of the Currency to issue circulating notes in the manner and proportion now provided by law to organizations organized, or to be organized, in those States and Territories having less than their proportion of circulation under an apportionment made on the basis of population and of wealth, as shown by the returns of the census of 1870.

There is a mandatory provision, taking effect immediately and first of all; and other provisions of this bill provide the manner and mode in which the money shall be withdrawn from the banks of the Eastern States; and among other modes it directs in aid of the provision in this bill, that it shall be assorted by the Treasurer, assistant treasurers, &c. This will carry into execution that which my friend from Indiana has proclaimed every day to be necessary, for this subject of finance has not been before the Senate at any time within the last three years that that Senator has not, with great eagerness and earnestness, turned to the Senate, and especially to the representatives of the New England States, and talked to them about the unequal distribution of the bank circulation.

Now I wish to call his attention to the fact that here, when a bill is conceded by the representatives of those States, when they themselves come forward and say they will aid us in passing a bill to surrender $25,000,000 of their circulation in order to answer this local demand, the only objection made to it comes from my friend from Indiana, who for so long has asked for the passage of such a bill. That is all I desire to say now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. HOWE. Allow me to ask the Senator from Ohio a question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I had only five minutes, and I do not want to trespass on my friend from Vermont.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator only asked for two, but he may go to five; he has three left.

Mr. HOWE. How much money will be returned? How many greenbacks will be returned to the Treasury within thirty days under this bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. No greenbacks; but the circulating notes of eastern banks.

Mr. HOWE. But they cannot get hold of those.

Mr. SHERMAN. The law expressly provides that it shall be done as rapidly as possible. He shall "proceed forthwith to carry into execution the" law.

Mr. HOWE. How many within thirty days? Twenty-five millions of greenbacks must be put into the Treasury.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all. As new banks are organized under the provisions of this act the Comptroller, having the list of the banks affected by this provision before him, makes a requisition from time to time—requires them to surrender their circulating notes in exact proportion as he goes on to organize new banks.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator read that language?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is at the bottom of the first page. I will read the clause:

> And it shall be the duty of the Comptroller of the Currency, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, to proceed forthwith to carry into execution the provisions of section 6 of said act; and, to enable him to do so, he is hereby authorized and required, from time to time, as needed for the execution of the said section, to make requisitions upon each of the national banks described in said section, organized in States having an excess of circulation—in accordance with the apportionment previously made.

Mr. HOWE. I think that is right.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to ask a question in reference to this banking bill. As this circulation is withdrawn from eastern banks and redistributed to the western and southern banks, is it to be distributed to banks hereafter to be organized, or to banks that may be already organized?

Mr. SHERMAN. It applies to banks existing or that may be organized. I will read again the third section:

> That from and after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for the Comptroller of the Currency to issue circulating notes in the manner and proportion now provided by law to associations organized or to be organized in those States and Territories having less than their proportion of circulation, under an apportionment made on the basis of population and of wealth, as shown by the returns of the census of 1870.

Mr. LOGAN. We have to pay 2½ per cent. for our circulation in the West.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLINTON LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution for the appointment of a joint committee of the two Houses to inquire into the affairs of the government of the District of Columbia, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 485) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the schooner Carrie, of Eastport, Maine; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 216) to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Fearless.

THE BANKRUPTCY ACT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont calls for the regular order, which is the bill (H. R. No. 792) to repeal the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved March 2, 1867, and all laws and parts of laws amendatory thereto; the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to the clause of the seventh section of the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary proposed to be stricken out by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. OGLESBY.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let that amendment be read, so that we may know what is pending.

The CHIEF CLERK. It was proposed by the Senator from Illinois to strike out in lines 39, 40, and 41, of section 7, the following words:

> Or who has stopped or suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of forty days.

It is proposed now to amend the clause moved to be stricken out, by striking out the word "who," at the end of line 39, and inserting, "being indebted in the sum of $3,000 and over;" and by striking out "forty," in the forty-first line, and inserting "ninety," so as to make the clause read:

> Or being indebted in the sum of $3,000 and over, has stopped or suspended and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of ninety days.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am reluctant to make points of order about this bill, but it is impossible to get on intelligently by having amendments in the third degree pending. The amendment reported by the committee is pending in the first place. Then the amendment of my friend from Illinois, [Mr. OGLESBY,] to strike out a portion of that, is pending in the second place. Now it is proposed to amend the amendment in another respect before taking the vote on the motion to strike out. A motion to strike out is not amendable in any way, and this is a motion to strike out a part of the pending amendment. Therefore I submit to the Chair, and I submit to the good sense of Senators, that it is much better to take the question on the motion of my friend from Illinois first. Then, if that clause is stricken out, these words can be inserted if the Senate think fit, or if it is not, they can be proposed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to that course being taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The point of order is well taken, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not make it for the purpose of making any embarrassment, but to relieve embarrassment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. OGLESBY] to the seventh section of the amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LOGAN. Let it be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out the following words, in lines 39, 40, and 41, of section 7 of the committee's amendment:

> Or who has stopped or suspended and not resumed the payment of his commercial paper within a period of forty days.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, if the Senate is willing to listen, (and if it is not, of course it is not advisable that I at least should say anything, for I cannot make myself heard over the Chamber unless there is reasonable order,) I should like to explain in five minutes why the amendment of my friend from Illinois ought not to be adopted, and I think my friend from Illinois will himself see, if he did not yesterday see, the impropriety of this amendment.

In the first place, this clause as it stands applies only to the class of people whom we call traders or business men; that is, people engaged in commercial enterprises, who, great or small—and how small they shall be is a question that we take up afterward—have come to an absolute stoppage of their business; they cannot meet their commercial paper; and the courts have decided under the existing law—because this is just as the law stood, except that we have extended the time from fourteen to forty days—that the mere fact that a man does not pay a particular piece of paper at maturity does not constitute bankruptcy; but, in the first place, it must be a paper that he honestly owes, and to which he has no defense, and the fact that he has stopped payment even on such a piece of paper is not of itself an act of bankruptcy if he stops payment on that paper, supposing honestly that he had arrangements to have it renewed or postponed. In other words, the construction of the courts on the clause as it now stands has been highly in favor of the honest debtor who had omitted to meet his paper on a given occasion. Then the courts have also decided that it must in substance be a general suspension of the debtor to meet his engagements, because, of course, if he suspend on only one piece of paper, and continues to pay the others, when he admits himself that he owes that, he is then making a fraudulent preference among his creditors, and may be put into bankruptcy on the other branch of the statute.

Then, as the law at present is, without now speaking of this length of time at all, but confining what I say to the exact point, the question is, whether a man engaged in business enterprises is to be allowed to let his business stop, except his selling his goods and taking in the money, perhaps to run away with before the forty days are out; whether he is to be allowed to stop paying, stop meeting his obligations, but still continue to receive assets from his debtors and act in the disposal of his property, if he does it in the ordinary course of business, for forty days. If you strike that all out and say that no such debtor shall be operated upon by the bankrupt law at all, how do you leave the debtor and creditor during that period of time, or, if this be stricken out, during all periods of time? You enable the man whose paper is overdue—it may be thousands or hundreds of dollars, no matter what—to set his creditors at defiance, and to say, "It is true I owe you; it is true I have not paid you; it is true I am continuing to sell out my stock of goods;" or "to dispose of my ore," if he is a miner; or "to go on with my banking business in the way of bills receivable," if he is a banker, and so on; "but as to paying anything I cannot do it." That is the attitude in which striking out this clause would leave this bill.

Can it be that any Senator wishes to put the trading community of this country into such an attitude as that? It would not work for a single moment, and no bankrupt system has ever existed in which there was not in substance exactly such a provision as this for the trader and the commercial man bringing himself under an inquiry, on the petition of his creditors, as to whether he had committed an act of bankruptcy if he did not continue to meet his obligations and go on with his business. You make it entirely one-sided. You say to the debtor, "You cannot be put into bankruptcy because you do not pay; you can go on and receive your money, dispose of your stock of goods, and run away at the end if you can, or whatever may happen, but your creditors cannot touch you in bankruptcy, where they all share equally, no matter how long you continue this course of business."

Of course a system of bankruptcy that lacked a provision such as this bill contains, and as every other bankrupt law has contained, would be perfectly suicidal. In this country, where the laws for the collection of debts are pretty severe generally, instead of assisting the debtor to raise funds to meet his engagements, it would drive every creditor to say, "It is now a question who soonest shall, by the sheriff and under the State law, seize the property of the debtor, or who soonest, by threats or otherwise, can get out of him some preference which may be so skillfully devised that you cannot break it up or prove it under the other provisions of the bankrupt law." That would be unjust. It would be impolitic, I submit to my honorable friend from Illinois, impolitic in the highest sense of that highest definition of policy, the administration of justice, tempered with gentleness and humanity at the same time. It would put the debtor in a far worse condition than he is with this limited protection that the law gives him, because now, fixing the period either at forty days, or at fourteen, as it is under the old law, or at seven as it is under the English law, the debtor during that time is preserved from the assaults of his creditors, either under the bankrupt act or under any State law, because the creditors know that if under the State law they do attach his property or undertake to get satisfaction to themselves at the expense of the other creditors, it will all be set aside at the end of the fourteen or forty days. That being the case, it does not appear to me that it is necessary to occupy much of the time of the Senate in asking them to decline to adopt the proposition of my friend from Illinois.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I am in favor of the amendment of my colleague for two or three reasons. In the first place I differ widely with my friend from Vermont, in reference to the question whether we should have a bankrupt law at all or not. But laying that aside, my views in reference to this amendment are not based upon the facts or the reasons that would actuate me to vote for a repeal of the law, but upon what I believe to be an unjust provision of the law.

I must confess that in regard to the present bankrupt law in body and the amendments now proposed to it, I was somewhat amused yesterday to see my friend from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] an old-fashioned democrat, and my friend from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] an old-fashioned whig, side by side in the advocacy of a bankruptcy law, especially so strict a one as this is.

But that is not the point which I rose to suggest. As I understand the provision now before us, it refers to a banker, broker, merchant, trader, manufacturer, or miner, who has fraudulently stopped payment, who has stopped payment through fraud or deceit or some intent on his part to defraud his creditors out of their just dues. The second portion of this particular part of the bill provides for those who have stopped or suspended payment for the term of forty days; and it is in reference to the latter portion of this section that my colleague proposes his amendment. I object to that provision in this bill for the reason, first, that the fact that a manufacturer, merchant, trader, or any business man has stopped payment for the term of fourteen days, as originally in the law, or the term of forty days, is no evidence whatever that there is an intention on the part of that debtor not to pay his creditor when he may be capable of doing so.

One of the great principles upon which a bankrupt law should be founded should be to protect honest debtors and honest creditors against fraud and deception or circumvention. It is not a fraud against a creditor that a man suspends payment for ten days, or twenty days, or forty days. It is a misfortune on his part, perhaps, that he cannot meet his paper; but because he does suspend for that time, you give the power into the hands of one creditor, if there are but four, to file his application and put the debtor into bankruptcy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Provided he owns a third of the debts.

Mr. LOGAN. Provided he owns a third of the debts, as a matter of course; that is necessarily included.

I could state many cases of hardship under this provision. It may be said that one exception to a general rule would not be sufficient; that the rule should apply generally, and exceptions would not prove that injustice would be done; but I could state many cases showing that injustice would be the general rule, as far as the West is concerned, and not the exception. I presume there is not a large manufacturer in the Northwest to-day who has been able to pay his commercial paper for the last forty days, and I presume there is not one in the Northwest to-day who will be ablefor the next forty days to pay his outstanding indebtedness that would be recognized under this bankrupt law as commercial paper. Hence this provision, which was one of the great grievances, so far as the debtor class of the country is concerned, under the old law, is improved but very little by the committee's amendment. It is only an extension of time from fourteen days up to forty days; and according to the manner in which business is done generally in the country, it is not that relief, under the provisions of this law, that the country demands, or that the debtor class of the country should have, and that the creditor class should have the benefit of.

Bankrupt laws are not intended for the purpose of protecting scoundrels on the debtor side or Shylocks on the creditor side, but every provision in this bill and in the law that this is an amendment to, in reference to involuntary bankruptcy, is for the benefit of the Shylock and not for the benefit of the honest creditor and the honest debtor. You may take bankrupt laws generally as they have been used and administered in the United States, and they have been laws that have protected more scoundrels than they have benefited honest men. Usually they have been laws, so far as voluntary bankruptcy is concerned, to allow dishonest men to be relieved of their debts. Now let me see if I am just in this statement. In all my experience I cannot call to mind one single man that ever voluntarily went into bankruptcy and afterward, if he became wealthy, paid a dollar of his debt that he was relieved from under an adjudication of bankruptcy.

Mr. THURMAN. I can give you the names of a dozen.

Mr. FERRY, of Connecticut. So can I.

Mr. LOGAN. Perhaps Senators can give me some names; but so far as my experience goes I have no knowledge of such persons; but I have knowledge of men to-day, in my own State, who have been adjudged bankrupts on their own application, who are bankers and wealthy men, and who have never paid a dollar of the debts that they were relieved from by reason of being adjudged bankrupts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask my friend a question?

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will he tell the Senate whether the men that he speaks of, who have been made voluntary bankrupts, and are wealthy men to-day, got off without the assent of one-half of their creditors in number and amount, and whether their discharge was resisted?

Mr. LOGAN. In several instances they were discharged wholly as bankrupts. I do not desire to mention the names of men here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does my friend mean without the assent of a majority of the creditors in number and amount?

Mr. LOGAN. They were discharged under the law, by complying with the rules and provisions of the voluntary bankrupt law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President; but the voluntary bankrupt law does not let off a man, unless, in the first place, he satisfies the court that he has been honest; and in the second place——

Mr. LOGAN. I understand that just as well as the Senator does.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish my friend to state how it happened that the creditors regarded him as a dishonest man, if more than half of them in number and amount chose to vote in favor of his being discharged?

Mr. LOGAN. I did not state that his creditors regarded him as a dishonest man. I made no such statement. I stated that men who had been relieved under the bankrupt law were to-day able to pay their debts, and I did not know one of them that had ever done so.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is another thing.

Mr. LOGAN. That was my statement. I did not say that the creditors at the time thought those debtors were dishonest, but their actions have proved that they relieved themselves under the bankrupt law for the purpose of getting rid of their debts, and they have not paid their creditors to this day. That is what I stated, and I repeat it to be a fact, and I could give a number of instances of that kind. Of course it was done under the bankrupt law, and they satisfied the court, by their oaths and by their exhibits, that they had surrendered all their property to be distributed among their creditors, but at the same time they had covered up their property, and had not made a fair and honest exhibit; but after the time expired under which the judgment could have been rescinded, and they brought into court again, they once more went into business, and have shown themselves in the condition I state.

I only mention this to show that in instances, and I believe generally, these bankrupt laws have been in favor of a class of men who were desirous of obtaining a release from their debts without being actuated by any great desire to relieve their creditors by a full payment.

Then, let us apply it to the second class, the involuntary bankrupt, the man who is forced into bankruptcy, the man who, perhaps, is an honest man and desires to pay his debts, but by reason of misfortune is not in a condition at the time to pay his debts. After the lapse of forty days from the time when he should have paid his note, he may be forced into bankruptcy and destroyed.

There is one objection applicable to this particular provision of the law to which I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Vermont, although I know that we differ so widely in our views on this subject that I cannot expect to convince him. Generally, before he brings a bill into the Senate, he is perfectly satisfied with it, of course from mature reflection; and no man in the Senate is more persistent in standing by his judgment and opinions than the Senator from Vermont, and properly so. But let me call his attention to one point.

I have never known a small trader or merchant throughout the country put into bankruptcy under this law, where he was known as a small trader and had a small amount of property, who ever paid his creditors. Why? Not because he was dishonest, but because the fees absorbed all the amount of his property, and the creditor lost his debt, and the debtor had not paid one cent except to the officers. That has been the rule in cases of involuntary bankruptcy as applicable to small traders and small merchants throughout my section of country. How it is in other places I do not know; but I know it is true as applicable to small traders in that part of the country where I reside. I do not believe an instance can be named in that portion of the country where the property of a small trader who has been forced into bankruptcy against his will has ever paid a pittance of the debts that he owed.

Hence I say that the theory of just and honest dealing between man and man is not found in bankruptcy laws, in my judgment; and for that reason I am to-day, as I have ever been, opposed to the principle of bankrupt laws. I am opposed to the principle of relieving a man from his debts; and I am opposed to the theory of allowing a creditor to become a Shylock and crush a man out of existence. Hence I am opposed to a bankrupt law as applicable to either debtor or creditor. I do not suppose a majority of the Senate will agree with me, but that is my notion on the subject.

But taking it for granted that the Senate intends to pass an amendatory bankrupt law, instead of repealing the law as it now exists, then I ask whether it is just to the small traders, merchants, bankers, brokers, manufacturers, and miners of this country, to allow them to be crushed in this manner by any one of the creditors who may be a fourth in number or one-third in valuation so far as the estimate of debts is concerned. The result will be to wipe out the small traders in the country wherever they are brought into bankruptcy.

I think the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] yesterday was a sound and good one, that no man should be forced into involuntary bankruptcy unless the claims against him amounted to two or three thousand dollars, or some amount that would be worthy of the claim to make a man a bankrupt. It is a partial disgrace to him, at least he so feels, it when he is forced into bankruptcy, as well as a destruction of his credit and a destruction of his property.

Now, sir, I am in favor, in the first place, of the amendment offered by my colleague to strike out this clause entirely, because I do not believe in it as a principle. If that is not done, I shall be in favor of a modification of it in accordance with the views suggested by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] But so far as the limit of forty days is concerned, I should certainly be in favor of striking that out. I would favor making it six months, if there must be any such limit, but reducing it down to the smallest time that I think would be just, it should be ninety days. That would have a semblance of justice in it. Our merchants, manufacturers, and other business men generally, have their notes made payable in thirty, sixty, or ninety days, or four months. It is a very common thing in my country to have paper made payable in four months. But instead of complying with either one of the times for which credit exists in a great portion of this country, thirty, sixty, or ninety days, the time fixed disagrees with all the various times on which credit is based or known in our country, or commercial paper extended. If it be extended from fourteen to forty days, it exceeds the first term of thirty days, but it is not a fair division between the three terms upon which credit is generally based, thirty, sixty, and ninety days. If it was a fair division between those times, it would be fairer than to put it at forty days, which is not a division at all. Hence I do not agree with that limitation of forty days. It is certainly too short. It is certainly a very short time to fix within which men may be put into bankruptcy all over the country.

This bill, with this short time in it, is no relief whatever to the great number of debtors throughout the country, who are manufacturers, brokers, bankers, and miners, and those who come within the purview and meaning of a bankrupt law. There is not a man to-day in the whole northwestern country who is a large debtor who has not run beyond the forty days, or who can pay within the next forty days. Hence I say this provision affords no relief. You might as well have left the law as it stood, with the fourteen days' limitation in it, because if a man is so crippled in his operations that he cannot make a loan in fourteen days he will not be likely to make it in forty days. You should give him sufficient time, where he has plenty of property, so that he can pay up when money becomes more abundant, or, at least, is released so that men can get hold of it. I know of a large manufacturing establishment in the city where I live that has over $1,000,000 invested, and I was told by the superintendent when I was at home a few weeks ago that their indebtedness was small, but on all their capital they could not raise a sufficient amount of money to meet their commercial paper to keep out of bankruptcy unless there was some relief given. That is only one instance so far as the large manufacturers are concerned in our portion of the country.

This much I have deemed it proper to say, merely to present the suggestions that have struck me in objecting to this particular portion of the bill.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator who has just taken his seat has indulged himself in so wide a range of remarks that we have almost lost sight of the immediate question that is before the Senate. I do not complain of this course, nor criticise it in the least; for first or last the questions that he has mooted will have to be discussed. But I wish to come to the very question which is before the Senate, and which arises on the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois on my right [Mr. OGLESBY] to strike out of the bill that provision which declares that if a banker, merchant, trader, miner, or manufacturer shall stop or suspend payment upon his commercial paper and not resume payment for forty days, he shall be deemed a bankrupt. I have risen to speak to that.

In the first place, that the amendment of the committee is more liberal than the original law in that respect is obvious from the fact that it gives the debtor forty days instead of fourteen in which to resume payment of his paper, and I need not say to any business man that forty days in which to turn around and secure such accommodations or make such arrrangements as may enable him to resume, would be far more valuable than the brief space of fourteen days.

In the second place, I have to observe that the law as it now stands is more favorable to the debtor than the English law, for, according to the English law, if a man stop payment his creditors may instantly procure a summons from the bankruptcy court, which is always in session, commanding him to appear and show cause why it is that he has stopped payment, even upon a particular piece of paper, and if he fail to appear in answer to that summons, or if he appear and acknowledge the debt to be due, or if he deny the debt and will not give bond that he will pay such sum as shall be found due by him upon the adjudication of that claim, then the law provides that on the eighth day thereafter he shall be deemed a bankrupt. So that practically according to the English law the time allowed for a man to resume payment of his debts who has stopped is eight or at most nine or ten days. The French law is even more stringent. The French law declares that the trader who stops payment is in a state of bankruptcy, and this state is held to exist virtually and with all its consequences, even before the adjudication which declares it officially. Without going into an inquiry what are the laws in other commercial countries, it may safely be said that if a bankrupt law is to be founded at all upon the principle that a trader who is unable to pay should have his estate administered in a bankrupt court, then the bill as proposed by the committee is the most liberal bill that is known to any commercial country on the globe.

That brings us, then, to the real foundation of this provision in the bill, and the foundation of the objection made to it by the Senator from Illinois on my right, [Mr. OGLESBY.] I understand the theory of that Senator's amendment to be that no one should be declared a bankrupt except in a case of fraud; and therefore he moves to strike out of the bill this clause which provides for a case where there is no fraud on the part of the debtor, either actual or constructive. Now, if the only foundation for a bankrupt proceeding is fraud, if there is no other reason for the existence of a bankrupt law than the existence of fraud, then the amendment of my friend from Illinois is perfectly right; but if that is not the only foundation of a bankrupt law, if that is only one of its foundations and not the most important of its foundations, then his amendment ought not to be adopted.

And now what is the fact? Why, sir, the fact is that bankrupt laws mainly rest upon this idea: that where a merchant, banker, trader, miner, or manufacturer, as it is in our law, or where a man of any of fifty occupations nearly, as it is in the English law, is unable to pay his debts, no matter whether by his fault or without his fault, no matter whether fraudulently or honestly, where he has failed in his business so that he cannot pay his debts, and so that he is therefore liable to have his property seized by process of law and administered under some form of law in some court or other, public policy dictates that it is best to administer his estate in that court which administers it for the equal benefit of all his creditors. That is the foundation of the bankrupt law. It is because if you leave his estate subject to all the processes of the courts of common law or of equity, if you leave it subject to be seized by this creditor or that creditor, or for preferences to be made by the debtor himself in favor of this creditor or that creditor, you put it in his power, or you put it in the power of an active and vigilant creditor, to defeat that equal and just distribution of the bankrupt estate which it is the policy of the law to provide and which equity requires. That, therefore, is the real foundation of a bankrupt law.

It is true there are cases of fraud which are declared to be acts of bankruptcy; but the great and solid foundation of all bankrupt laws is that the man who has carried on business has failed in his business, be it honestly or dishonestly, and that the law therefore can seize his property, and that public policy and justice to all his creditors require that his estate should be taken into that forum which can administer it and distribute it equally among all his creditors, so that no injustice shall be done to any. And that being the case, there is no foundation (unless my friend means to strike down all bankrupt laws at all) for moving to strike this provision out of the bill because it does not allege a case of fraud. It alleges that case which of all other cases is the main foundation of all bankrupt laws wherever they exist.

But, sir, again to show that this is so, and eminently so, in our legislation, I beg the attention of the Senator, and of all Senators, to what I am now going to say. So true is it that the bankrupt law rests upon the inability doctrine, that the debtor who is unable to pay shall have his estate administered for the benefit of all his creditors in a court competent to administer it, that we have put into our bankrupt law what is not found in any other bankrupt law with which I am acquainted—the doctrine of voluntary bankruptcy. But no man can become a voluntary bankrupt and have the benefit of that law who has been a dishonest and fraudulent man. The law expressly requires that the voluntary bankrupt shall have clean hands—not be tainted with fraud at all.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me there to ask him a question? Did he ever know an act in the world which provided that a man should not, by reason of fraud, be allowed to do anything?

Mr. THURMAN. If my friend will hear me through, he will find that his question is not very relevant.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator said that the law provided that a man could not become a voluntary bankrupt through fraud; but can he not call to his mind a case of bankruptcy where the person's conduct has shown afterward that his bankruptcy was obtained through fraud—by false swearing?

Mr. THURMAN. I will answer the question presently. What I was showing is, that one entire half of our law, in the first place, is founded, not upon the doctrine that the debtor has committed fraud but expressly upon the ground that he has not committed fraud That is the voluntary part of the law. And the sole foundation there for the debtor coming into court is that he is an honest man, unable to pay his debts. Thus we recognize in that branch of the law inability to pay debts. Inability of an honest man to pay his debts is a sufficient reason for administering his estate in the court of bankruptcy for the equal benefit of all his creditors. But how is it with the case of the involuntary bankrupt? Here again we recognize the very same principle; for although a man may be put into involuntary bankruptcy on the express ground of fraud, although that is a sufficient cause for putting him into bankruptcy, yet he cannot get a discharge unless he has been an honest man. Fraud defeats his discharge; it does not defeat the administration of his estate, but it prevents him from obtaining that privilege which the honest man may obtain—a discharge from his debts. Then, both in the voluntary and in the involuntary part of the bankrupt law we recognize distinctly the principle on which the law rests, that it is inability to pay the debts which constitutes the cause of bankruptcy.

This being the case, there is no foundation in principle for the amendment offered by my friend from Illinois on the right, [Mr. OGLESBY.] The law does not stand on the ground of fraud alone.

But the Senator from Illinois behind me [Mr. LOGAN] is opposed to a bankrupt law at all. He thinks that a bankrupt law is oppressive to the debtor and an aid to the Shylock creditor. If that Senator had carefully studied all the provisions of the bill as reported by the Judiciary Committee, I think he would scarcely have said that this law, as we have reported it, is oppressive to the debtor. Nor do I think that he would have ventured the other criticism, that it favors the unscrupulous and pound of flesh creditor. Why, sir, what is it? I am compelled now to refer to some other provisions than that immediately under consideration. As the law now exists, any one or more of the creditors whose claims amount to $250 may put a debtor into bankruptcy. That is an excessively severe provision.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me a word right there? He declares that I said this law was favorable to a Shylock creditor. I will give him one fact that caused me to make that remark. I did make it, and have nothing to retract from it. Would he believe that a man was acting—I do not know that the word "Shylock" would apply, but—oppressively if he demanded of a debtor that unless he gave him a note payable at a certain length of time with 2 per cent. interest a month, he would put him into bankruptcy? Would the Senator consider that oppressive?

Mr. THURMAN. I would.

Mr. LOGAN. I can name a dozen instances of that kind that have taken place under my own knowledge. That is the reason why I said it was a benefit to the Shylock creditor.

Mr. THURMAN. To be sure, that would be a case of oppression. Undoubtedly the Senator can name such cases; but it is precisely because he can name such cases, it is just because, as the law now stands, one Shylock can do that thing, and a thousand Christians cannot prevent him, that we have said, by our bill, that it shall require one-fourth of the creditors in number and one-third in value, and then I do not think the Shylocks will have much chance to extort 2 per cent. a month. This bill by this very amendment has stricken down that very power of levying black-mail, or extorting from the needs of a debtor, of which the Senator complains. That is precisely what our amendment utterly destroys.

But that is not all, Mr. President. We not only require one-fourth in number of the creditors and one-third in value to agree—and here I would remark, in passing, that where creditors one-fourth in number and holding one-third of the debts due agree that a man ought to be put into bankruptcy, the presumption is that nine-tenths of his creditors, if consulted, would agree to the same thing, and that it is for the benefit of the creditor, as well as of the debtor, that his estate should be administered in a court of bankruptcy and for the equal benefit of all the creditors—but then, having hedged this proceeding about by requiring that one-fourth in number and one-third in value must concur to put a man in bankruptcy, what next? What next do we do to relieve him from the extortions of Shylocks? What next do we do to relieve an honest man who has simply been unfortunate? Why, sir, we provide that if a majority in number and value of his creditors shall agree to a composition with that man, and the court upon examination of it, after full notice to all the creditors, and hearing what they have to say, shall consider that that composition is a just composition, and for the benefit of the creditors, the court may enforce it as a bankrupt proceeding, and then all further proceedings under this act cease, except to enforce that very agreement. What more beneficent provision could exist for the honest debtor, or what more beneficent provision for the honest creditor could exist than that provision which we have thus made for the ease and the benefit of them both?

But, sir, that is not all. We have gone still further, and provided that if a majority in number and value of the creditors presented to the court that it is to the interest of the creditors that the proceedings in bankruptcy should be discontinued, and no further steps be taken under them, and if the court upon hearing their petition, after due notice to all the parties, shall come to the same conclusion at which they have arrived, the court may dismiss the proceedings, and nothing further is done in that suit.

Why, sir, the only criticism among the hundreds and hundreds that have been sent to the committee and its members in regard to these provisions is that we have made the law too lenient to the debtor, and deprived the creditor, the single creditor, the Shylock creditor if you please, of that advantage which he has under the present law, and which the critics think he ought, to some extent, to retain. So, sir, whatever may be said of this bill, this much I can say of it, that it is the most liberal and the least oppressive bill upon honest debtors of any bankrupt law that has existence on this globe. To be at all effective, it is the most beneficent and the most lenient.

But the Senator from Illinois behind me [Mr. LOGAN] saw fit to remark, quite playfully I suppose, that he was astonished yesterday to see an old-fashioned democrat and an old-fashioned federalist, or a new-fashioned radical—I forget which it was——

Mr. LOGAN. Either one will do.

Mr. THURMAN. Sitting side by side here advocating a bankrupt bill. Mr. President, I am not entirely astonished to see an old-fashioned democrat and my radical friend who sits by my side [Mr. EDMUNDS] standing up in this Senate advocating the reconstruction laws or a Ku-Klux law, for such things do happen sometimes, strange as they may seem.

Mr. LOGAN. I was only calling the Senator's attention to the fact that he had got into a strange crowd.

Mr. THURMAN. This is the first time that I ever heard it was against old-fashioned democracy to support the Constitution of the United States, which declares—

> The Congress shall have power to establish an uniform rule of naturalization, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies throughout the United States.

I thought that it was the very peculiarity, the idiosyncrasy, so to speak, the fanaticism some people have called it, of the democratic party that they stuck to this old, worn-out, and now I am afraid obsolete parchment called the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me right there to ask him a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course he understands that there is no political question in this matter, and I made my remark playfully; but, inasmuch as he appeals to the Constitution, I should like to make a suggestion to him. I ask him whether or not our party at that time, the democracy, did not universally repudiate the bankrupt law and insist that the voluntary clause of it was unconstitutional; and is it not true that they never acquiesced in it until the courts decided it to be constitutional? Is not that the fact?

Mr. THURMAN. Most unquestionably the democratic party, as a general rule, though they were divided upon it, opposed the bankrupt law of 1841. There was no exact party division about it, and I do not think my friend will find that many political platforms made by State conventions or the like take any particular notice of it. Everybody knew why that law was passed. Everybody knew that that law was to relieve the men who, in the great commercial convulsion of 1837 and the years that followed that, had become broken down and insolvent, and that the great provision of that law of 1841, which was to have effect, and which was almost the only provision in it that did have effect, was the provision for voluntary bankruptcy. Why, sir, I do not believe that for a hundred cases of voluntary bankruptcy under the act of 1841 there was one case of involuntary bankruptcy. I believe I should be nearer the truth to say that in a thousand bankrupt cases under the act of 1841, nine hundred and ninety-nine of them were cases of voluntary bankruptcy, and but one a case of involuntary bankruptcy. And, sir, it was a great question whether a uniform system of bankruptcy included a case of voluntary bankruptcy within the contemplation of the Constitution of the United States. No such thing had ever existed in the United States nor in England; no such thing was known to England when our Constitution was formed; and it was argued that the term "bankruptcy" had a definite meaning when the Constitution was formed, and that it meant the administration of an insolvent trader's estate—for "trader" was the word then used and the only word—the compulsory proceeding to administer that estate; and there were men who insisted that that was the meaning of it within our own Constitution. That point was answered; but on the great question whether there could be such a thing as voluntary bankruptcy there was the greatest division of opinion among the lawyers of the country, without regard to party; and here I may say in passing that it was only the speech made by Mr. Webster in the Senate Chamber in support of that feature of the law, made before he went into the Cabinet, which carried that feature of the bill, and which afterward received the sanction of the courts.

But now, sir, in regard to the position of the democratic party on the subject of involuntary bankruptcy, I could cite my friend to a very long and able speech, delivered by the man who was then recognized as the leader of the democratic party in this Chamber, the Senator from Missouri, Colonel Benton, insisting that a bankrupt law, just such as we now have, was the thing most needed in this country to protect the people from the frauds of banks and the depreciation of bank currency. It was a favorite hobby of his—a bankrupt law that should operate on corporations. And now let me tell my friend that there is not a moneyed business corporation in all this land, not a railroad company, not a banking company, national or otherwise, having an act of incorporation, that is not subject to the provisions of the bankrupt law.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question right there? Does he claim that a national bank is subject to be put in bankruptcy?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. The judge of the United States court in our State has decided that it is not. That is the difference between him and the judge of the United States court.

Mr. THURMAN. I cannot help it. If it is Judge Drummond, I have a very high opinion——

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; Judge Blodgett, whose decision has been very highly complimented.

Mr. THURMAN. That may be so, but I cannot help it; I must read the law for myself, and I know lawyers quite as distinguished as the judge the Senator mentions who agree with me that this language is so broad and so comprehensive that it includes every national bank in the country. And, sir, with great respect for the decision of that judge, as I heard Mr. Webster once say when arguing a case in the Supreme Court, and no less a case than that which grew out of the burning of the Caroline—the McLeod case—that he always had great respect for the opinion of every court until it was reversed, I may say that I have great respect for the opinion of the judge whose opinion is cited by my friend, and shall have until it is reversed; but I cannot give up my own judgment of words as plain as these: "The provisions of this act shall apply to all moneyed, business, or commercial corporations." "All moneyed," that is one class; "business" is another; "or commercial corporations;" "and joint-stock companies." If a bank is not a moneyed corporation, I do not know what it is; if it is not a business corporation, I do not know what it is.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator will allow me to interrupt him, because we want to be correct about this point, as it may be an important matter, though it comes up incidentally. It is a question on which the opinions of the courts of this country will be invoked certainly. I differ with the Senator, though perhaps my opinion may not be very good on such a question. The bank law provides its own mode of winding up the national banks. It, in itself, provides the manner in which those banks shall go into liquidation or be wound up by a receiver; and inasmuch as it provides its own mode and manner of their being wound up and going into the hands of a receiver, it takes them out of the purview and meaning of the statute of bankruptcy, and the courts have so held; and that, in my judgment, is the law.

Mr. THURMAN. I was going to notice that, although this debate on that subject is perhaps occupying the time of the Senate unnecessarily.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely referred to it because the Senator called it out incidentally. Inasmuch as I do not agree on that point of law, I thought we might as well have the reasons stated here.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not object to that, but I ask my friend to put this into his thinking cap when he considers this subject again: that the provision in the bank law providing for winding up a national bank under the supervision of the Comptroller of the Currency cannot be held to take it out of the clause of a bankrupt law that had no existence for three years afterward. Your bankrupt law is the last legislative expression on the subject. The bankrupt law was passed three years after the national-banking law; and this law, passed three years after the bank law was enacted, declares in plain words that every moneyed and every business corporation of this land shall be subject to its provisions. Sir, there is nothing in the country that will perhaps be found more efficient in making the corporations of this country—railroads, banks, and business corporations of all kinds—perform their duties and discharge them well than the existence of a bankrupt law, that, while it is not oppressive, shall yet be efficient.

But, sir, I have occupied too much of the time of the Senate, because of the range that this debate has taken. However, these are matters that would have to be spoken some time or other, and perhaps no excuse is necessary. My answer to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. OGLESBY] is that which I have given; his amendment ignores the fundamental idea upon which bankrupt laws everywhere are found to rest.

Mr. CROZIER. I suppose that the amendment of the Senator from Illinois was prompted by a disposition to make the provisions of the bankrupt law less oppressive on debtors; but I think I can show him that the effect of the amendment, if adopted, striking out this clause, will be precisely the reverse.

The law as it now stands on this particular subject is this:

> Or who, being a banker, merchant, or trader, has fraudulently stopped or suspended, and not resumed payment of his commercial paper within a period of fourteen days.

It will be observed that the word "fraudulently" is included in the law as it now stands; and that is omitted in the clause which the Senator from Illinois moves to strike out; but every lawyer who has observed the execution of this law, and knows what the decisions of the courts have been under it, knows that that clause, although it includes the word "fraudulently," has by construction been made to include just such cases as are provided for in this amendment. Without going beyond the Chamber, if Senators will take Brightly's Digest and notice references to the decisions under this particular clause, they will see that the courts have held, as I have stated, that cases where a man has failed to pay his commercial paper from inability to do so alone, with no element of fraud whatever in the case, are within the meaning of the law as it stands. So, then, if this provision be stricken out, and the rest of the committee's amendment adopted, the law will stand under the construction of the courts as it is to-day held to be, that where a man for any reason, no matter whether fraudulently or not, in fact fails to pay his commercial paper for fourteen days, he will be adjudged to have committed an act of bankruptcy.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. CROZIER. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I agree entirely with what the Senator says if I assume his theory, his understanding of this section. I call his attention, however, to the fact that the nature of this particular amendment is such that it will blot out entirely section 39 of the existing law, and bodily substitute for that section this provision, and nothing else. Therefore, should the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois prevail, I submit to the Senator from Kansas, in place of having the effect which he ascribes to it, the result would be to put this section as it is, with these words omitted, in the place of that section which he reads from the printed volume. If I am right so far, what would be the legal effect of that? It would be to withdraw and subtract from those whose acts might consign them to bankruptcy the man who, without fraud, had simply been unable for forty days to pay his commercial paper; and thus, if I am right, it seems to me that my honorable friend from Illinois would accomplish exactly what he means to accomplish, to wit, he would substitute for the existing thirty-ninth section, which includes this fourteen-day provision, a sec ion which would include nothing, be it for fourteen days or forty days, subjecting an honestly delinquent debtor to the operation of the act.

Mr. CROZIER. I agree with the Senator from New York that there would be no time provided then, by law, at all, under which a man might be adjudged a bankrupt for failing to pay his commercial paper.

Mr. CONKLING. And there would be no provision, unless his act was fraudulent, that he might be adjudged for failing to pay his commercial paper during any time whatever, however long.
